THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers.
NUMBER SIXTY-SIX SOUTH THIRD ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

EDMUND DEACON, HENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

CLUBS.—FOR TERMS TO CLUBS, SEE PROSPECTUS ON THIRD PAGE.

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXVIII. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1848. WHOLE NO. 1423.

Choice Poetry.

THE CROWDED STREET.

BY W. C. BRYANT.

Let me move slowly through the street,
Filled with an ever-shifting train,
Amid the sound of steps that beat
The murmuring walks like autumn rain.

How fast the flitting figures come—
The mild, the fierce, the stony face—
Some bright with thoughtless smiles and some
Where secret tears have left their trace.

They pass—to toil, to strife, to rest;
To balls in which the feast is spread;
To chambers where the funeral guest
In silence sits beside the dead.

And some to happy homes repair,
Where children, pressing cheek to cheek,
With mute caresses shall declare
The tenderness they cannot speak.

And some, who walk in calmness here,
Shall shudder as they reach the door—
Where one who made their dwelling dear,
Its flower, its light, is seen no more.

Youth, with pale cheeks and slender frame,
And dreams of greatness in thine eye!
Goest thou to build an early name,
Or early in the task to die?

Keen son of trade, with anxious brow!
Who is now fluttering in thy snare?
Thy golden fortunes, tower they now?
Or melt the glittering spires in air?

Who of this crowd, to-night, shall tread
The dancer till daylight gleams again?
Who sorrow o'er the untimely dead?
Who wether in chrono of mental pain?

Some, fanime-struck, shall think how long
The cold, dark hours, how slow the light!
And some, who flaunt among the throng
Shall hide in dens of shame to-night.

Each, where his task or pleasures call,
They pass, and heed not each other not,
There is, who heeds, who holds them all
In His large love and boundless thought.

These struggling tides of life, that seem
In wayward, aimless course to tend,
Are edges of the mighty stream
That rolls to its appointed end.

PARTING ODE.

Sung at the close of the exercises at the recent Commencement of Yale College.

Peacefully, tenderly,
Here, as we part,
The farewell that lingers
Be breathed from the heart
No place more befitting,
Oh, home of the Lord—
Here be it spoken,
That prayer of love!

Thoughtfully, carefully,
Solemn and slow—
Tears are behaving
The path that we go.
Pertils before us
We know not to-day—
Kindly and safely,
Oh, Lord, lead our way.

Upwardly, steadfastly,
Gaze on that brow!
Jesus, our leader,
Reigns conqueror now!

He steps let us follow,
His sufferings there—
Up to Hay,
He blessedness share.

Patiently, cheerfully,
Up! and depart
To labor until day,
With undismayed heart
The vanquished, with gladness,
To Zion we'll bring,
Shouting Salvation
To Jesus our king.

Pictures of Life.

MY FATHER'S FIRST LOVE.

FROM "THE CASTLE," NOW BEING PUBLISHED IN BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

CHAPTER I.

"I lost my mother early; my father, (a good man, but who was so indolent that he rarely stirred from his chair, and who often passed whole days without speaking, like an Indian dervish,) left Roland and myself to educate ourselves much according to our own tastes. Roland shot, and hunted and fished,—read all the poetry and books of chivalry to be found in my father's collection, which was rich in such matters, and made a great many copies of the old chivalry,—the only thing in which my father ever evinced much of the vital principle. Early in life I conceived a passion for graver studies, and by good luck I found a tutor in Mr. Tibbets, who, but for his modesty, Kitty, would have rivalled Porson. He was a second Budæus for industry, and, by the way, he said exactly the same thing that Budæus did, viz: 'that the only lost day in his life was that in which he was married; for on that day he had only had six hours for reading!' Under such a master I could not fail to be a scholar. I came from the university with such distinction as led me to look sanguinely on my career in the world.

"I returned to my father's quiet rectory, to pause and look about me, and consider what path I should take to fame. The rectory was just at the foot of the hill, on the brow of which were the ruins of the castle Roland has since purchased. And though I did not feel for the ruins the same romantic veneration as my dear brother, (for my day-dreams were more colored by classic than feudal recollections,) I yet loved to climb the hill book in hand, and build my castles in the air amidst the wreaks of that which time had shattered on the earth.

"One day, entering the old weed-grown court, I saw a lady, seated on my favorite spot, sketching the ruins. The lady was young—more beautiful than any woman I had yet seen, at least to my eyes. In a word, I was fascinated, and, as the trite phrase goes, 'spell-bound.' I seated myself at a little distance, and contemplated her without desiring to speak. By-and-by, from another part of the ruins, which were then uninhabited, came a tall, imposing, elderly gentleman, with a benignant aspect, and a little dog. The dog ran up to me, barking. This drew the attention of both lady and gentleman to me. The gentleman approached, called off the dog, and apologized with much politeness. Surveying me somewhat curiously, he then began to ask questions about the old place, and the family it had belonged to, with the name and antecedents of which he was well acquainted. By degrees it came out that I was the descendant of that family, and the younger son of the humble rector who was now its representative. The gentleman then introduced himself to me as the Earl of Rainsforth, the principal proprietor in the neighborhood, but who had so rarely visited the country during my childhood and earlier youth, that I had never before seen him. His only son, however, a young man of great promise, had been at the same college with me in my first year at the university. The young lord was a reading man and a scholar, and we had become slightly acquainted when he left for his travels.

"Now, on hearing my name, Lord Rainsforth took my hand cordially, and leading me to his daughter, said, 'Think, Ellinor, how continent this is the Mr. Caxton whom your brother so often spoke of.'

"In short, my dear Pleistratus, the ice was broken, the acquaintance made, and Lord Rainsforth, saying he was come to stone for his long absence from the county, and to reside at Compton the greater part of the year, pressed me to visit him. I did so. Lord Rainsforth's liking to me increased; I went there often."

My father paused, and seeing my mother had fixed her eyes upon him with a sort of mournful earnestness, and had pressed her hands very tightly together, he bent down and kissed her forehead.

"There is no cause, my child!" said he. It is the only time I ever heard him call my mother by that paternal name. But then, I never heard him before so grave and solemn—not a quotation, too,—it was incredible; it was not my father speaking—it was another man. "Yes, I went there often. Lord Rainsforth was a remarkable person. Shyness, that was wholly without pride, (which is rare) and a love for quiet literary pursuits, had prevented his taking that personal part in public life for which he was richly qualified; but his reputation for sense and honor, and his personal popularity had given him no inconsiderable influence even, I believe, in the formation of cabinets, and he had once been prevailed upon to fill a high diplomatic situation abroad, in which I have no doubt that he was as miserable as a good man can be under any infliction. He was now pleased to retire from the world, and look at it through the loopholes of retreat. Lord Rainsforth had a great respect for talent, and a warm interest in such of the young as seemed to him to possess it. By-the-by, indeed, his family had risen, and were strikingly characterized. His ancestor, the first peer, had been a distinguished lawyer; his father had been celebrated for scientific attainments; his children, Ellinor and Lord Pendarvis, were highly accomplished. Thus, the family identified themselves with the aristocracy of intellect, and seemed unconscious of their lie me to the lower aristocracy of rank. You must bear this in mind throughout my story.

"Lady Ellinor shared her father's tastes and habits of thought—(she was not then an heiress.) Lord Rainsforth talked to me of my career. It was a time when the French Revolution had made statesmen look out with some anxiety to see how strengthen the existing order of things, by alliance with all in the rising generation who evinced such ability as might influence their contemporaries.

"'University distinction is, or was formerly, among the popular passports to public life. By degrees Lord Rainsforth liked me so well, as to suggest to me a seat in the House of Commons. A member of Parliament might rise to anything, and Lord Rainsforth had sufficient influence to effect my return. Dazzling prospect this to a young scholar fresh from Thucydides, and with Demosthenes fresh at his tongue's end. My dear boy, I was not then, you see, quite what I am now; in a word, I loved Ellinor Compton, and therefore I was ambitious. You know how ambitious she is still. But I could not mould my ambition to hers. I could not contemplate entering the senate of my country as a dependant on a party or a patron—as a man who must make his fortune there—as a man who, in every vote, must count for how much nearer he advanced himself to emolument. I was not even certain that Lord Rainsforth's views on politics were the same as mine would be. How could the politics of an experienced man of the world be those of an ardent young student? But had they been identical, I felt that I could not so creep into equality with a patron's daughter. No! I was ready to abandon my own more scholastic predilections—to strain every energy at the bar—to coffee or force my own way to fortune—and, if I arrived at independence, then—what then? why, the right to speak of love, and aim at power. This was not the view of Ellinor Compton. The law seemed to her a tedious, needless drudgery; there was nothing in it to captivate her imagination. She listened to me with that charm which she yet retains, and by which she seems to identify herself with those who speak to her. She would turn to me with a pleading look when her father dilated on the brilliant prospects of a parliamentary success; for he (not having gained it, yet having lived with those who had,) overvalued it, and seemed ever to wish to enjoy it through some other. But when I, in turn, spoke of independence, of the bar, Ellinor's face grew overcast. The world—the world was with her, and the ambition of the world, which is always for power or effect! A part of the house lay exposed to the east wind. 'Plant half-way down the hill,' said I, one day. 'Plant!' cried Lady Ellinor—'it will be twenty years before the trees grow up. No, my dear father, build a wall, and cover it with creepers!' That was an illustration of her whole character. She could not wait till trees had time to grow up; a dead wall would be so much more quickly thrown up, and parasite creepers would give it a prettier effect. Nevertheless, she was a grand and noble creature. And I—in love! Not so discouraged as you may suppose; for Lord Rainsforth often hinted encouragement, which even I could scarcely misconstrue. Not caring for rank, and not wishing for fortune beyond competence for his daughter, he saw in me all he required—a gentleman of ancient birth, and one in whom his own active mind could prosecute that kind of mental ambition which overdowed in him, and yet had never had its vent. And Ellinor!—heaven bless! I should say she loved me,—but something made me think she could do so. Under these actions, suppressing all my hopes, I made a bold effort to master the influences around me, and to adopt that career I thought worthiest of us all. I went to London to read for the bar."

"The bar! is it possible?" cried I. My father smiled sadly.

"Everything seemed possible to me then. I read some months. I began to see my way even in that short time; began to comprehend what would be the difficulties before me, as I to feel there was a spirit within me which could master them. I felt a boldness of conception and generalizing power. I found Roland there on my return. Always of a roving adventurous temper, though he had not then entered the army, he had, for more than two years, been wandering over the Continent on foot. It was a strange knight-errant whom I embraced, and who overwhelmed me with reproaches that I should be reading for the law.—There had never been a lawyer in the family! I knew not exactly wherefore, whether from jealousy, fear, foreboding! but it certainly was a pain that seized me—when I learned from Roland that he had become intimate at Compton Hall. Roland and Lord Rainsforth had met at the house of a neighboring gentleman, and Lord Rainsforth had welcomed his acquaintance, at first perhaps for my sake, afterwards for his own.

"I could not for the life of me," continued my father, "ask Roland if he admired Ellinor; but, when I found that he did not put that question to me, I trembled!"

"We went to Compton together, speaking little by the way. We stayed there some days."

My father here thrust his hand into his waistcoat—all men have their little ways, which denote much; and when my father thrust his hand into his waistcoat, it was the sign of some mental effort—he was going to prove, or to argue, to narrate, or to preach. Therefore, though I was listening before with all my ears, I believe I had, speaking magnetically and mesmerically, an extra pair of ears, a new sense supplied to me, when my father put his hand into his waistcoat.

CHAPTER II.

UNDERSTANDING MY FATHER CONTINUES HIS STORY.

"There is not a mystical creation, type, symbol, or poetical invention for meanings abstruse, recondite, and incomprehensible, which is not represented by the female gender," said my father, leaning his hand quite buried in his waistcoat. "There is the Sphynx, and the Enigma, and the Chimera, and Isis, whose veil no man had ever lifted: they are all ladies, Kitty, every one of them! And so was Petrophane, who must be always either in Heaven or hell—and Hecate, who was one thing by night and another by day. The Sibyls were females; and so were the Gorgons, the Harpies, the Furies, the Fates, and the Teutonic Valkyrs, Nornies, and Hela herself: in short, all representations of ideas, obscure, inscrutable, and portentous, are mere feminine."

Heaven bless my father! Augustine Caxton was himself again! I began to fear that the story had slipped away from him, lost in that labyrinth of learning. But luckily, as he paused for breath, his look fell on those limpid blue eyes of my mother's, and that honest open brow of hers, which has certainly nothing in common with Sphynges, Chimeras, Fates, Furies, or Valkyrs; and, whether his heart smote him, or his reason made him even that he had fallen into a very disingenuous and unsound train of assertion, I know not, but his front relaxed, and with a smile he resumed—"Ellinor was the last person in the world to deceive any one willingly. Did she deceive me and Roland that we both, though not concealed men, fancied that, if we had dared to speak openly of love, we had not so dared in vain? or do you, think, Kitty, that a woman really can love (not much, perhaps, but somewhat) two or three, or half a dozen at a time?"

"Impossible," cried my mother. "And as for this Lady Ellinor, I am shocked at her—I don't know what to call it!"

"Nor I either, my dear!" said my father, slowly taking his hand from his waistcoat, as if the effort were too much for him, and the problem were insoluble. "But this, begging your pardon, I do think, that before a young woman does really, truly, and cordially centre her affections on one object, she suffers fancy, imagination, the desire of power, curiosity, or Heaven knows what, to stimulate, even to her own mind, pale reflexions of the luminary not yet risen—parhelia that precede the sun. Don't judge of Roland as you see him now, Pisistratus—grim, and gray, and formal—imagine a nature soaring high amongst daring thoughts or exuberant with the nameless poetry of youthful life—with a frame matchless for bounding elasticity—an eye bright with haughty fire—a heart from which noble sentiments sprang like sparks from an anvil. Lady Ellinor had an ardent, inquisitive imagination. This bold fancy nature must have moved her interest. On the other hand, she had an intellect, full, and eager mind. Am I vain if I say, now at the close of so many years, that in my mind her intellect felt companionship? When a woman loves, and marries, and settles, why then she becomes—a one whole, a completed being. But a girl like Ellinor has in her many women. Her mind, her heart, slides, as fancies please her. I do believe that, if either of us had spoken the word boldly, Lady Ellinor, would have shrunk back to her own heart—examined it, tasked it: and given a frank and generous answer. And we who had spoken first might have had the better chance not to receive a 'No.' But neither of us spoke. And perhaps she was rather curious to know if she had made an impression, than anxious to create it. It was not that she willingly deceived us, but her whole nature was diffusive. Met come before the sunrise. Homer tho be, Roland and I were not long in detecting each other. And hence arose, first coldness, then jealousy, then quarrels."

"Oh, my father your love must have been indeed powerful, to have made a breach between the hearts of two such brothers!"

"Yes," said my father; "it was amidst the old ruins of the castle, there, where I had first seen Ellinor—that, winding my arm round Roland's neck, as I found him seated among the weeds and stones, his face buried in his hands—it was there that I said—'Brother, we both love this woman! My nature is the calmer of the two, I shall feel the less loss. Brother, shake hands, and God speed you, if I go!'"

"Austin," murmured my mother, sinking her head on my father's breast.

"And thereupon we quarrelled. For it was Roland who insisted, while the tears rolled down his eyes, and he stamped his foot on the ground, that he was the intruder, the interloper—that he had no hope—that he had been a fool and a madman—and that it was for him to go! Now, while we were disputing, and words began to run high, my father's old servant entered the desolate place, with a note from Lady Ellinor to me, asking me in the form of some book I had praised. Roland saw the hand-writing, and while I turned the note over and over irresolutely, before I broke the seal, he vanished.

"He did not return to my father's house. We did not know what had become of him. But I, thinking over that impulsive volcanic nature, took quick alarm. And I went in search of him; came on his track at last; and after many days, found him in a miserable cottage amongst the most dreary of the dreary wastes which form so large a part of Cumberland. He was so altered I scarcely knew him. To be brief, we came at last to a compromise. We would go back to Compton. This suspense was intolerable. One of us at least should take courage and claim his bride. But who should speak first? We drew lots, and the lot fell on me.

"And now that I was really to pass the Rubicon, now that I was to impart that secret hope which I had concealed even from myself, I was like the wheel where my sensations! My dear boy, depend on it that that age is the happiest, when such feelings as I felt then can agitate us no more. There are mistakes in the science under of the human heart, which, even in the prime of manhood, I have been widered if you had asked us to fish for a mermaid! Do you see, now, one reason why I have let you go thus early into the world? Well, but amongst those minnow-fishers there was one who fished with an art that made the minnows look larger than salmon.

"Trevanion had been at Cambridge with me. We were even intimate. He was a young man like myself, with his way to make in the world. Poor as I—of a family upon a par with mine—old enough but decayed. There was, however, this difference between us. He had connexions in the great world—I had none. Like me his chief pecuniary resource was a college fellowship. Now, Trevanion had established a high reputation at the university; but less as a scholar, though a pretty fair one, than as a man to rise in life. Every faculty he had was an energy. He aimed at every thing—lost some things, gained others. He was a great speaker in a debating society, a member of some politico-economical club. He was an eternal talker—boldland, various, paradoxical, florid—different from what he is now. For, dreading fancy, his career since has been an effort to curb it. But all his mind attached itself to something that we Englishmen call solid; it was a large mind—not, my dear Kitty, like a fine whale sailing through knowledge from the pleasure of sailing—but like a polypus, that puts forth all its feelers for the purpose of catching hold of something. Trevanion had gone at once to London from the university, his reputation and his talk dazzled his connexions, not unjustly. They made an effort—they got him into parliament: he had spoken, he had succeeded. He came to Compton with the flush of his virgin fame. I cannot convey to you, who know him now—with his care-worn face, and abrupt dry manner—reduced by perpetual gladiatorship to the skin and bone of his former self—what that man was when he first stepped into the arena of life.

"You see, my listeners, that you have to recollect that we middle-aged folks were young then—that is to say, we were as different from what we are now, as the green bough of summer is from the dry wood, out of which we make a ship or a gate-post. Neither man nor wood comes to the uses of life till the green leaves are stripped and the sap gone. And then the uses of so many years, that in my mind her intellect felt companionship? When a woman loves, and marries, and settles, why then she becomes—a one whole, a completed being. But a girl like Ellinor has in her many women. Her mind, her heart, slides as fancies please her. I do believe that, if either of us had spoken the word boldly, Lady Ellinor, would have shrunk back to her own heart—examined it, tasked it: and given a frank and generous answer. And we who had spoken first might have had the better chance not to receive a 'No.' But neither of us spoke. And perhaps she was rather curious to know if she had made an impression, than anxious to create it. It was not that she willingly deceived us, but her whole nature was diffusive. Met come before the sunrise. However this be, Roland and I were not long in detecting each other. And hence arose, first coldness, then jealousy, then quarrels."

"Oh, my father your love must have been indeed powerful, to have made a breach between the hearts of two such brothers!"

"Yes," said my father; "it was amidst the old ruins of the castle, there, where I had first seen Ellinor—that, winding my arm round Roland's neck, as I found him seated among the weeds and stones, his face buried in his hands—it was there that I said—'Brother, we both love this woman! My nature is the calmer of the two, I shall feel the less loss. Brother, shake hands, and God speed you, if I go!'"

"Austin," murmured my mother, sinking her head on my father's breast.

"And thereupon we quarrelled. For it was Roland who insisted, while the tears rolled down his eyes, and he stamped his foot on the ground, that he was the intruder, the interloper—that he had no hope—that he had been a fool and a madman—and that it was for him to go! Now, while we were disputing, and words began to run high, my father's old servant entered the desolate place, with a note from Lady Ellinor to me, asking me in the form of some book I had praised. Roland saw the hand-writing, and while I turned the note over and over irresolutely, before I broke the seal, he vanished.

"He did not return to my father's house. We did not know what had become of him. But I, thinking over that impulsive volcanic nature, took quick alarm. And I went in search of him; came on his track at last; and after many days, found him in a miserable cottage amongst the most dreary of the dreary wastes which form so large a part of Cumberland. He was so altered I scarcely knew him. To be brief, we came at last to a compromise. We would go back to Compton. This suspense was intolerable. One of us at least should take courage and claim his bride. But who should speak first? We drew lots, and the lot fell on me.

"And now that I was really to pass the Rubicon, now that I was to impart that secret hope which I had concealed even from myself, I was like the wheel where my sensations! My dear boy, depend on it that that age is the happiest, when such feelings as I felt then can agitate us no more. There are mistakes in the science under of the human heart, which, even in the prime of manhood, I have been widered if you had asked us to fish for a mermaid! Do you see, now, one reason why I have let you go thus early into the world? Well, but amongst those minnow-fishers there was one who fished with an art that made the minnows look larger than salmon.

"Trevanion had been at Cambridge with me. We were even intimate. He was a young man like myself, with his way to make in the world. Poor as I—of a family upon a par with mine—old enough but decayed. There was, however, this difference between us. He had connexions in the great world—I had none. Like me his chief pecuniary resource was a college fellowship. Now, Trevanion had established a high reputation at the university; but less as a scholar, though a pretty fair one, than as a man to rise in life. Every faculty he had was an energy. He aimed at every thing—lost some things, gained others. He was a great speaker in a debating society, a member of some politico-economical club. He was an eternal talker—boldland, various, paradoxical, florid—different from what he is now. For, dreading fancy, his career since has been an effort to curb it. But all his mind attached itself to something that we Englishmen call solid; it was a large mind—not, my dear Kitty, like a fine whale sailing through knowledge from the pleasure of sailing—but like a polypus, that puts forth all its feelers for the purpose of catching hold of something. Trevanion had gone at once to London from the university.

Our Correspondents

A NEW CORRESPONDENT.

[We have received the following well written letter from a young correspondent, whom we have long known as a most charming writer. Our readers will be pleased to see her name in our columns. Miss Lida Lovegood, the author of the following letter, is a young lady of fine talents, and a most charming writer. Some years ago, when she was a little girl, she used to write for the Saturday Post, and we used to publish her letters. She has been a long time absent from the pleasant fields of literature, but we hope she will now be induced to take a place in our corps of correspondents. At least such is our view of the case—but Green is "of age," mentally as well as attending to law, and can speak for herself. And now for our new correspondent's letter.]

LETTER FROM LIDA LOVEGOOD.

[FOR THE SATURDAY POSTMAN POST.]

GENTLEMEN,—Before entering upon the subject of my letter, I cannot forbear calling your attention to the unique and charming name with which I have graced the close of it, and endeavoring to make you perceive how wonderful it was that I should fall in up out of a book more nearly than usual from fairyland. Perhaps, gentlemen, on the very evening before your paper containing Green Gammon's charming letter came to hand. And I am fully persuaded in my own mind, that if her imaginite is more "suggestive," as she would say, of gentlemen, majority, &c., in respect to hipocisy and cousins, mine will win the palm—in other words, if hers is high-sounding and quotably, mine is practical and lovable. But I am forgetting that "open falsehoods" are also "open enemies" and my admirable little text must wait, may never appear in print after all my disquisition.

So to come to the point. I have sealed myself with a firm determination to take your favorite theme to task for some sentiments contained in her letter dated Sept. 10th, 1848. Green is a vivacious, lofty genius and spirited, of her visit to the "Hub." I pass over the "charming cottage," near which her "sensibilities were shocked" at the sight of a damned "pulling a cow;" because I am aware that with the intelligent and refined idea of humanity this is human, as it should be, an without of occupation for fellow. Yet I have vivid by before my memory's eye the recollection of our dear English family, who, in their native land, are guilty of their little, much of the wealth and talent of the kingdom, and who, becoming reduced, emigrated to the Western portion of our Republic, where daughters, high-minded and intellectual as they were, deemed it no disparagement not only to assist their mother in the house, thus obviating the unpleasant necessity of sending a "lady," but to continually to milk the cows, when there was no one else to do it.

Oh the remembrance of the happy hours spent in my woods and hay-fields, sweet Maple Farm! Where I was my own chieftain, set upon the throne in the shade of a fragrant hay-stack, immersed in beauty and evil thoughts, and covered each other with the new-mown hay, till we looked like musty hay-stacks ourselves. How we rambled in the wood and by the cool, dark streams among the alders, where the south wind came to us with a restless coldness, like a mother's loving whisper. Then the startling half-exclaiming manner in which we chased the tow-summer, signaging here for a flower there for a butter-fly, and again for nothing at all stringing about in a fashion which would have rejoiced the hearts of a whole tribe of gypsies. Then after we came the banks, the music, the much-beloved, the dancing dancing eyes and glad voice voices, telling of "some spirit in their bodies," and the presence of the heart-warm band would have even the love of our sensitive Green herself, although that band in the morning her and sister having faithfully performed all their domestic labors.

Sweet Maple Farm! How gladly would I revisit your broad rolling meadows, your quiet or short shades, your green-house and your cabbage-garden, even at the risk of spending some two hours every morning in the kitchen, to enjoy the society of the dear inmates, that I am sadly, strangely, while these yet gone "worship of pin-tion," and I sadly fear that most of the withering sentiments which I had prepared for her, have slipped from my mind in the wanderings.

Concerning the "Sentiment of the Little" over the "debit," in the matter of onions and cabbages &c; mean, I have little to say, between Green speaks positively, and I know that greater mouthfulness are sometimes made, than for a man who persuades himself that he is "a man of the world." Yet a cottage as she describes, to content himself with; woman who has neither the wan nor the talent to when it. I would venture, however, to which per in Green's case, that the fear of the onion-patch before her sidebonnet, would not cause her to lay her hand too soon to discover the violets and roses or at least the poppies and marigolds which might have been blooming near. But I am not strenuous on this point, and probably should not have thought of it at all, but for the fact that I have lately so turned from a trip through some of the Western counties of Ohio, where I was much surprised and gratified at the appearance not only of neatness and prosperity among what we call the lower classes, but at a certain degree of attention to minor matters, which I have always thought a characteristic of Yankees, &c., which are generally supposed to form no part of the "calculations" of a Western farmer struggling for life in a new country.

In the land of almost every dwelling, however humble, clustered tall lilacs and rose-bushes, are not unfrequently the dahlia reared her stately head, striving to rival the royal flower itself. So many exhibitions of this kind among people who, I am certain, had no "sidebonnets" to please and obliging fairies" to perform their household work, but actually first made their bread and butter and then ate it, so many green wooden boxes, and wooden two-posts standing in mended windows, containing perhaps, one pane of glass, and a geranium, so tenderly watched and watered; made me almost a convert to the fascinating theory that every in time heart yearns after the Beautiful.

But I am afraid Green will think me getting tantamount, if I proceed to the third count in the indictment, which is, in fact, the only one worth litigation. I mean the terms in which she speaks of the "respectable help-ocracy" of "our-vants," a name which I do utterly detest, and hope you long to see banished from the vocabulary of Americans.

Now, I have always given Green credit, not only for much goodness of heart, but for a fair portion of the reforming element, and I cannot believe that she would in sober earnest speak heartlessly of any class of her fellow beings, however disagreeable in manners and habits they may be. When those habits and manners were formed by circumstances so proscriptions as usually attend the lives of domestics.

A character degraded in spite of moral training and pure associations, breaking away from influences which would have restrained and elevated it, falling, like a stone, from light and honor, from blackness and chaos, is surely more worthy of commiseration; yet how generally our sympathy and forbearance are extended toward such an one while ridicule and contempt are heaped upon those venial offenders, the servants, forsooth, they are called, but "best hands." I can fancy Green saying, "I; they were only ignorant and erring she could teach them, perhaps even take some of the prejudices by the hand and tell them of better things and their self-imposed superintendents, keep benevolent at a distance, and form the great act barrier to their improvement."

I acknowledge the truth of this, but if poverty and a wrongly constituted society have made their victims ignorant, should our society at least compassionate, and deal with them as leniently as possible?

Green has a fine flow of spirits, and a strong penchant for fun-making, and to this I attribute some that she says concerning the "hardening of tem-pers and hearts, the destruction of patience and sanders," &c. I have that in many families "foreign help" is always indispensable, in the conflict cases frequently so, and if Green really "stands a chance of becoming domestic and so-cling she" it would not be "many to help" reputation, if her "habits of study and place of pleasure" are shortingly interrupted, so that she considers barbarian her first danger, it is indeed a depressible state of things; but I do not believe she seriously thinks it impossible for a young lady healthy and active, to pass two or three hours daily in her mother's kitchen, and yet have sufficient time left for a reasonable amount of reading, writing and recreation. Yet it is not surprising that a young lady who earns and doubtless receives a pecuniary remuneration of "pin-money," and can there have "offered it," should prefer to pass all her time in intellectual instead of household pursuits, as I will not quarrel with Green for that, especially as I have myself been recently stigmatized by a domestic as being "a deal fonder of setting round and readin' books, than sewin' to the work." All I contend for is that justice, fair and equal, be done both to the labor and the labourer, and on neither a cent more others than they deserve.

Before I close, let me briefly mention her remark upon pride, that "unpardonable sin, that capital crime root of the Allegheniss." Oh, Green! be good; I would have you so, Heaven would have you so; proof enough of your God-given genius and brilliant talents, to exert them for the procurement of purposes, the elevation of Truth, the world's good of Mankind. But Green seems to refer to pride of another sort, pride of birth, station, circumstances, or something, I hardly know what. And yet this is great belief. To think of Genius, the sympathising, the affectionate, getting scattered and exclusive, —to imagine the heart-lighted face which I have looked in picture to my mind's eye, growing hard and haughty, and casting scornful glances toward the plebeian crowd! Out upon it! Even by the passing thought I have associated her noble nature. But I would have her like the Roman's wife, "chaste simplicity." I would have her guard the innocence of her intellect with a jealous eye, lest they should come to dull chart of their fading gold. In a word, I would have her take a prime place among the "female reformers" of the age. Do not be startled, gentlemen, I am no disciple of Abby Kelley, but if there is any character I do have, it is an active, earnest woman, jealously using her talents, which she have very, and for purposes, which all love, for the advancement of human living good, the advancement of some worthy purpose.

LIDA LOVEGOOD.

Gibin, Ohio, Oct., 1848.

AND YET MARCHING.

Green's modest remarks about "help" in the Hub, seem to have caused quite a stir in the hives. The busy bees do not fancy having their sweet quietude ruffled, and "buzz, buzz." And we are inclined to think that Green's remarks were right. Perhaps in just though it would be fatal to my theme to not some truth in them: unless the Western "help" is far superior to our Eastern, and the cabob, half line with the mistress, and quite of it with the models. But hear "Salty Shaggon," who talks as if she was "one of them."

WESTERN HELP.

Salem, Columbiana Co., Ohio, Oct. 10, 1848.

GENTLEMEN:—After placing some cream in the churn this morning, I take up the Post of the 7th inst., to entertain myself whilst making "the think cream to butter turn." The first article that met my eye was Grace Greenwood's letter of September 20th, in which she speaks rather disparagingly of domestic labor, and those who perform it. Now, although I always read anything from her pen with great avidity, I was astonished to find the sentiments such sentiments; for I had thought her an Democratic, not Republican, to give the least countenance to the unjust distinctions so rapidly finding their way into our Northern States. One gentleman remarked, after reading her letter, "Why, she had better go to the South at once, where she can be well waited upon."

Green must, if anything of a philanthropist, rejoice in the high and noble motives sentiments are opening to her eye than those they have now frequently occupied, in the kitchens of persons possessing rather more worldly wealth than themselves, who seem to consider that a sufficient excuse for their treating every kind of hardship upon their "help."

I have from full experience the trials incident to one who performs the labors of a household—the weary limbs, the worn and ruffled spirits, the tiresome, uncertain, imperfectly connected with them; but I beg of Green, for pity's sake, not to blame innocent girls for refusing to place themselves under the care of mistresses, who, in their anxiety for "intellectual pursuits, or pleasure enjoyment," forget there may be kindred feelings in these they "employ," and so completely usurpation all their time, as not to leave them a moment for recreation.

Grace must know, or if she does not, I do, that many intelligent, efficient girls in the West, who would be thankful and willing to render their services to others, were it not for the unavoidable consequence of loss of caste!

Why even she admits that she does not consider a woman that works (I employ the word in its common acceptation) can be intellectual or have much enjoyment. How, then, can she, the author, capable of reflection, voluntarily place herself in such a situation? However, I consider her mistaken in her view of the matter. I believe it is only in a faithful discharge of our duties, be they great or small, and not through any pleasure we may form for ourselves, that we can find true pleasure. And as long as we have to eat, drink, and sleep, why should it be derogatory to the dignity of any rational being, to contribute to the supply of nature's demands!

In our village the most intelligent, efficient, and agreeable women are those who perform all kinds of domestic labor, have the charge of families, and minister to all their wants—who read, study and writing hours are snatched at intervals when their children are asleep, or at play, (or even when nursing their little ones to sleep upon their laps,) and after having faithfully performed all their domestic labors.

It is true we have even here, some of the would-be aristocracy, but I fancy they find fewer enjoyments than we of the working class. I heard a spirited girl say in regard to going to service in one of these families, that she should ask more than ordinary wages to compensate in some measure for the disgrace of living in their kitchen. And she was right; for in addition to more drudgery than is generally imposed in more democratic families, she was to be service amongst the aristocracy are made to feel that there is a wide difference between employers and employed.

I know a young girl of respectable connexions, who, not very long since, went to live with a family that professes to believe that all who are upright are equal. After completing her allotted tasks, which occupied till about 10 o'clock in the evening, she ventured to take a seat in the sitting-room. There happened to be some young persons visiting there who began to wink and titter, and finally the daughter of the family taking a candle, withdrew with her company to an upper apartment, after which she returned and informed the astonished girl that if she wished to retire, Susan (a little child they had living in the family,) would show her the way to bed. The next morning she sought for an explanation of such treatment, and instead gratified at the appearance not only of neatness and prosperity among what we call the lower classes, but at a certain degree of attention to minor matters, which I have always thought a characteristic of Yankees, &c., which are generally supposed to form no part of the "calculations" of a Western farmer struggling for life in a new country.

In the land of almost every dwelling, however humble, clustered tall lilacs and rose-bushes, are not unfrequently the dahlia reared her stately head, striving to rival the royal flower itself. So many exhibitions of this kind among people who, I am certain, had no "sidebonnets" to please and obliging fairies" to perform their household work, but actually first made their bread and butter and then ate it, so many green wooden boxes, and wooden two-posts standing in mended windows, containing perhaps, one pane of glass, and a geranium, so tenderly watched and watered; made me almost a convert to the fascinating theory that every in time heart yearns after the Beautiful.

But I am afraid Green will think me getting tantamount, if I proceed to the third count in the indictment, which is, in fact, the only one worth litigation. I mean the terms in which she speaks of the "respectable help-ocracy" of "our-vants," a name which I do utterly detest, and hope you long to see banished from the vocabulary of Americans.

Now, I have always given Green credit, not only for much goodness of heart, but for a fair portion of the reforming element, and I cannot believe that she would in sober earnest speak heartlessly of any class of her fellow beings, however disagreeable in manners and habits they may be. When those habits and manners were formed by circumstances so proscriptions as usually attend the lives of domestics.

A character degraded in spite of moral training and pure associations, breaking away from influences which would have restrained and elevated it, falling, like a stone, from light and honor, from blackness and chaos, is surely more worthy of commiseration; yet how generally our sympathy and forbearance are extended toward such an one while ridicule and contempt are heaped upon those venial offenders, the servants, forsooth, they are called, but "best hands." I can fancy Green saying, "I; they were only ignorant and erring she could teach them, perhaps even take some of the prejudices by the hand and tell them of better things and their self-imposed superintendents, keep benevolent at a distance, and form the great act barrier to their improvement."

I acknowledge the truth of this, but if poverty and a wrongly constituted society have made their victims ignorant, should our society at least compassionate, and deal with them as leniently as possible?

Green has a fine flow of spirits, and a strong penchant for fun-making, and to this I attribute some that she says concerning the "hardening of tem-pers and hearts, the destruction of patience and sanders," &c. I have that in many families "foreign help" is always indispensable, in the conflict cases frequently so, and if Green really "stands a chance of becoming domestic and so-cling she" it would not be "many to help" reputation, if her "habits of study and place of pleasure" are shortingly interrupted, so that she considers barbarian her first danger, it is indeed a depressible state of things; but I do not believe she seriously thinks it impossible for a young lady healthy and active, to pass two or three hours daily in her mother's kitchen, and yet have sufficient time left for a reasonable amount of reading, writing and recreation. Yet it is not surprising that a young lady who earns and doubtless receives a pecuniary remuneration of "pin-money," and can there have "offered it," should prefer to pass all her time in intellectual instead of household pursuits, as I will not quarrel with Green for that, especially as I have myself been recently stigmatized by a domestic as being "a deal fonder of setting round and readin' books, than sewin' to the work." All I contend for is that justice, fair and equal, be done both to the labor and the labourer, and on neither a cent more others than they deserve.

Before I close, let me briefly mention her remark upon pride, that "unpardonable sin, that capital crime root of the Alleghanies." Oh, Green! be good; I would have you so, Heaven would have you so; proof enough of your God-given genius and brilliant talents, to exert them for the procurement of purposes, the elevation of Truth, the world's good of Mankind. But Green seems to refer to pride of another sort, pride of birth, station, circumstances, or something, I hardly know what. And yet this is great belief. To think of Genius, the sympathising, the affectionate, getting scattered and exclusive, —to imagine the heart-lighted face which I have looked in picture to my mind's eye, growing hard and haughty, and casting scornful glances toward the plebeian crowd! Out upon it! Even by the passing thought I have associated her noble nature. But I would have her like the Roman's wife, "chaste simplicity." I would have her guard the innocence of her intellect with a jealous eye, lest they should come to dull chart of their fading gold. In a word, I would have her take a prime place among the "female reformers" of the age. Do not be startled, gentlemen, I am no disciple of

United States SATURDAY POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1848.

REMOVAL.

Our subscribers will please take notice that we have removed the office of the Post, from No. 98 Chestnut Street, to No. 44 South Third Street, first house below the Girard Bank. Our office is in the second story, above that of the North American.

TO POSTMASTERS.

We trust our old friends, the Postmasters, will exert themselves and get up large clubs for the mammoth Post; we if they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offers themselves, that they will show our Prospectus to some other influential and responsible persons who will be willing to do so. We think there need be no great difficulty in getting subscribers to the enlarged paper, as those who will take the trouble to compare it with the other weekly papers, cannot fail to perceive that it outshines all competition. Let it be remembered, also, that the postage is just the same as a first class paper, as on the smallest and poorest of the small reprints.

NOTICE.

Subscribers wishing their paper changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it hereafter sent to.

All persons sending letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State as well as of the town in which they live.

Post Masters or others sending for a club, would confer a favor by having them sent to one address when they can do so conveniently.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TO A. H. The writer of this poem regrets that we did not think a former piece up to the standard of the Post. He says: "It was merely a tribute to friendship without pretending to poetic excellence." Does not our friend see he is very unreasonable in asking us to publish articles which are "merely tributes to friendship," without possessing that poetic excellence which alone makes them generally acceptable?—We could fill our paper, large as it is, weekly, with original matter, and thereby please a number of authors and their friends greatly, but what would our vast family of other readers think?

ACCEPTED. "October," "Sonnet to John M. Botts," and "The Fallen Star."

DECLINED. "Music of the Sea," "Fond Expectations," "Genius, Its Trials and Rewards," "Song," and "Awake!" are respectfully declined. Most of these pieces have much merit; but we think not quite sufficient to warrant us in inserting them in the Post.

SERENADE. Parts of this are pretty, but it hardly "shows enough sense." Does the author think he is doing a sensible thing in singing to his lady love as follows:

"Oh, wake thee, lady—come with me.
And thou my guiding star shall be.
Together we the fields we'll stray
And gather flowers till dawn of day."

Suppose his fair sweetheart was to take him at his word and comply with his request, would he not be obliged to see the front door open, and she come trapping out, attired for a ramble in the fields, "ere dawn of day." The consequences would probably be a severe cold, and danger of consumption, to the young lady, and a scandal of scandals. Friend S., never ask a lady to do that in poetry, which you would be ashamed to ask her to do in sober prose.

R. J. L. As we have not near so high an opinion of the production in question as the lady critic, we must yield to her decision the publication of the article sent us.

TO OUR FRIENDS.

Over six months ago, when we became sole proprietors of the Post, and enlarged the paper to its present mammoth size, we took the liberty of calling upon those of our readers who wished us success in our efforts, to exert themselves to aid us in the only way in which such aid could be effectually rendered, by prevailing upon their friends and neighbors to subscribe to the enlarged paper.

This appeal, we are pleased and proud to say, did not fall upon unheeding, or unwilling hearts. Our friends in all directions bestirred themselves, and soon the names of new subscribers began to pour in upon us in clubs of eight, and twenties, and even fifties—making an aggregate of many thousands. For those efforts of our friends—friends truly, though out of them unknown—in us personally—we were and are profoundly grateful.

But as the time has now come round, when individuals in the country may naturally be supposed to have leisure to devote a little time to some means of supplying reading for the long winter evenings that are approaching, we have thought that we might make bold to request the services of our friends in another way, and strong pull, and pull altogether," to place the Post in some thousands of happy homes—happy save in the respect of their being without a large and good, or even perhaps without any newspaper.

We know this is asking our friends to take some trouble on our behalf, but we also know the little trouble they will have to encounter, is no comparison to the great good they are able to do us.

In these cases especially where the subscription of a club has run small in the low many, generally, in making up the new club, to double or even treble and quadruple its number.

As some inducement to such efforts, we renew the premium to the poet town sending us the largest subscription list of new names. Salem has it this year—how easy any one of five hundred other towns might have had it.

In conclusion, we may say that our strenuous efforts shall be continued to maintain for the Post that character already awarded to it by the best judges, of being decidedly the most interesting and the highest toned family weekly paper published on the American Continent.

DEACON & PETERSON.

THE FOREIGN NEWS.

The news brought by the last steamship, the Europa, is of a very important character. Austria and Russia are co-acting, in a degree, with her Emperor, the part played by the Czar of Russia in 1815. All will remember how the latter, after having fled from Paris, became again, after being brought back, the object of enthusiastic royalty; which changed yet again into hatred and aversion. So the Emperor now, after being compelled to fly from Tyrol, where he had taken refuge, and been received with great demonstrations of attachment, was again lost the love and confidence of "his faithful Vienness."

In truth, it appears as if a people accustomed from birth to the presence of a king, are afraid, at first, that the heavens will fall if he deserts them. But little by little they become used to the thought of doing without him, and again break out into violence with the natural attempts to re-establish his rudely shaken power.

Thus, in Vienna, another insurrection has broken out. The general cause of it was a belief that the king was taking reactionary measures, and concentrating troops around the capital to overawe the people. But the immediate cause, was the attempt to remove a portion of the military, the German Grenadiers, who were known to be friendly to the popular cause, and, as it was believed, because of that friendliness. These troops were ordered to march to join the army in Hungary, being "escorted" by a squadron of cavalry. The people assembled and opposed their progress—a contest began, in which the Grenadiers sided with the people and the National Guards. The troops were defeated in the victorious, the arsenal being at last surrendered, and the loyal troops and the troops evacuated the town, and, at the last advices, were encamped outside its walls.

One deed of shame was done by the insurgents, or some, we would believe, by the vile portion of them. A party broke into the War Office, seized the cannon and arms deposited in that building, and inhumanly murdered Count Latour, the Minister of War. An account in the London Times says:

"The wretched man was conducted into the street, and then he was murdered with blows from axes and sledge hammers. The people tore the clothes and orders from the bleeding body and hung the naked corpse on a gibbet, where it remained suspended for a whole day, during which the National Guards riddled it with musket balls.

We trust this statement is exaggerated; but it is evident that the Austrians are not so well prepared for liberty as the French. Count Latour, who was sent by the Emperor to mediate between the Hungarians and the Croatians, who are at open war, was seized by the mob of Olm, dragged from his carriage, and brutally murdered. Such events in a country where people are accustomed to the brutality of a tyrannical government, to be able to practice at once that toleration and mildness which are inseparably linked with true freedom.

The Emperor of Austria had fled from his palace at Schonbrun, for the apparent purpose of allying troops to crush the insurrection. The result of the civil war, which seems impending, will depend upon the support given by the people of Austria generally, to the Viennese. It is supposed that the Emperor may possibly call in the aid of Russia, in which event, France would undoubtedly aid the popular cause, and the general war in Europe, so long feared—and for that very reason, thus far successfully avoided—be the result. The effect of this outbreak may also be the removal of the war for possession of Lombardy by Charles Albert, and a sympathetic insurrection in Naples, now that the Neapolitan army is fully employed at home.

The same question appears to be agitation France, which is agitating us, that of the Presidency. Louis Napoleon has had the want of courage to open his lips in the National Assembly, and leaving this exposed the cabbies of his mind, his ignorance of the nature of his duty. Ledru Rollin is eloquent—more, he failed in statesmanlike effort. He hesitated, he was cautious, he said nothing of the glory of France, of its being indissolubly connected with that of the great founder of his house, he did not touch that electric chord, the name of Bonaparte, he spoke with a Gaelic accent. His opponents breathed freer, they saw their advantage. M. Thouvet, who had offered an amendment in consideration of the "Pretender," as he called him, rose from his seat, and, with undisguised irony, said, that after the speech of the orator, they had hoped he was quite satisfied that his force of the "Pretender" were exaggerated, and that his amendment was needless, and therefore withdrew it. The observation was received with loud plaudits from all sides of the Assembly, excepting from that upon which Prince Louis Napoleon and his friends were seated. The Debats said, in its report, that the words spoken by the oratorical novice produced a marvellous effect, for they set those who meet based him quite at their ease.

In proportion as Louis Napoleon's chances diminish, do those of Cavaignac, and Lamartine,—yes, of Lamartine—increase. For Lamartine, that "noblest Roman of them all," may be after all the first President of the new Republic. A letter made by him to Madame Dupin on electing the first President—whether by the Assembly or by the people—did much to settle that question in favor of the liberal and republican course, and has rolled that flame of admiration which at the commencement of the Revolution burst for him so brightly. The following description of the effect of his speech may be found in the Paris paper "La Presse."

M. de Lamartine went on to show how selfishness would sometimes mislead legitimate intentions in opening to her eye than those they have now frequently occupied, in the kitchens of persons possessing rather more worldly wealth than themselves, who seem to consider that a sufficient excuse for treating every kind of hardship upon their "help."

I have from full experience the trials incident to one who performs the labors of a household—the weary limbs, the worn and ruffled spirits, the tiresome, uncertain, imperfectly connected with them; but I beg of Green, for pity's sake, not to blame innocent girls for refusing to place themselves under the care of mistresses, who, in their anxiety for "intellectual pursuits, or pleasure enjoyment," forget there may be kindred feelings in these they "employ," and so completely usurpation all their time, as not to leave them a moment for recreation.

Grace must know, or if she does not, I do, that many intelligent, efficient girls in the West, who would be thankful and willing to render their services to others, were it not for the unavoidable consequence of loss of caste!

Why even she admits that she does not consider a woman that works (I employ the word in its common acceptation) can be intellectual or have much enjoyment. How, then, can she, the author, capable of reflection, voluntarily place herself in such a situation? However, I consider her mistaken in her view of the matter. I believe it is only in a faithful discharge of our duties, be they great or small, and not through any pleasure we may form for ourselves, that we can find true pleasure. And as long as we have to eat, drink, and sleep, why should it be derogatory to the dignity of any rational being, to contribute to the supply of nature's demands!

In our village the most intelligent, efficient, and agreeable women are those who perform all kinds of domestic labor, have the charge of families, and minister to all their wants—who read, study and writing hours are snatched at intervals when their children are asleep, or at play, (or even when nursing their little ones to sleep upon their laps,) and after having faithfully performed all their domestic labors.

It is true we have even here, some of the would-be aristocracy, but I fancy they find fewer enjoyments than we of the working class. I heard a spirited girl say in regard to going to service in one of these families, that she should ask more than ordinary wages to compensate in some measure for the disgrace of living in their kitchen. And she was right; for in addition to more drudgery than is generally imposed in more democratic families, she was to be service amongst the aristocracy are made to feel that there is a wide difference between employers and employed.

I know a young girl of respectable connexions, who, not very long since, went to live with a family that professes to believe that all who are upright are equal. After completing her allotted tasks, which occupied till about 10 o'clock in the evening, she ventured to take a seat in the sitting-room. There happened to be some young persons visiting there who began to wink and titter, and finally the daughter of the family taking a candle, withdrew with her company to an upper apartment, after which she returned and informed the astonished girl that if she wished to retire, Susan (a little child they had living in the family,) would show her the way to bed. The next morning she sought for an explanation of such treatment, and instead gratified at the appearance not only of neatness and prosperity among what we call the lower classes, but at a certain degree of attention to minor matters, which I have always thought a characteristic of Yankees, &c., which are generally supposed to form no part of the "calculations" of a Western farmer struggling for life in a new country.

In the land of almost every dwelling, however humble, clustered tall lilacs and rose-bushes, are not unfrequently the dahlia reared her stately head, striving to rival the royal flower itself. So many exhibitions of this kind among people who, I am certain, had no "sidebonnets" to please and obliging fairies" to perform their household work, but actually first made their bread and butter and then ate it, so many green wooden boxes, and wooden two-posts standing in mended windows, containing perhaps, one pane of glass, and a geranium, so tenderly watched and watered; made me almost a convert to the fascinating theory that every in time heart yearns after the Beautiful.

But I am afraid Green will think me getting tantamount, if I proceed to the third count in the indictment, which is, in fact, the only one worth litigation. I mean the terms in which she speaks of the "respectable help-ocracy" of "our-vants," a name which I do utterly detest, and hope you long to see banished from the vocabulary of Americans.

Now, I have always given Green credit, not only for much goodness of heart, but for a fair portion of the reforming element, and I cannot believe that she would in sober earnest speak heartlessly of any class of her fellow beings, however disagreeable in manners and habits they may be. When those habits and manners were formed by circumstances so proscriptions as usually attend the lives of domestics.

A character degraded in spite of moral training and pure associations, breaking away from influences which would have restrained and elevated it, falling, like a stone, from light and honor, from blackness and chaos, is surely more worthy of commiseration; yet how generally our sympathy and forbearance are extended toward such an one while ridicule and contempt are heaped upon those venial offenders, the servants, forsooth, they are called, but "best hands." I can fancy Green saying, "I; they were only ignorant and erring she could teach them, perhaps even take some of the prejudices by the hand and tell them of better things and their self-imposed superintendents, keep benevolent at a distance, and form the great act barrier to their improvement."

I acknowledge the truth of this, but if poverty and a wrongly constituted society have made their victims ignorant, should our society at least compassionate, and deal with them as leniently as possible?

Green has a fine flow of spirits, and a strong penchant for fun-making, and to this I attribute some that she says concerning the "hardening of tem-pers and hearts, the destruction of patience and sanders," &c. I have that in many families "foreign help" is always indispensable, in the conflict cases frequently so, and if Green really "stands a chance of becoming domestic and so-cling she" it would not be "many to help" reputation, if her "habits of study and place of pleasure" are shortingly interrupted, so that she considers barbarian her first danger, it is indeed a depressible state of things; but I do not believe she seriously thinks it impossible for a young lady healthy and active, to pass two or three hours daily in her mother's kitchen, and yet have sufficient time left for a reasonable amount of reading, writing and recreation. Yet it is not surprising that a young lady who earns and doubtless receives a pecuniary remuneration of "pin-money," and can there have "offered it," should prefer to pass all her time in intellectual instead of household pursuits, as I will not quarrel with Green for that, especially as I have myself been recently stigmatized by a domestic as being "a deal fonder of setting round and readin' books, than sewin' to the work." All I contend for is that justice, fair and equal, be done both to the labor and the labourer, and on neither a cent more others than they deserve.

Before I close, let me briefly mention her remark upon pride, that "unpardonable sin, that capital crime root of the Alleghanies." Oh, Green! be good; I would have you so, Heaven would have you so; proof enough of your God-given genius and brilliant talents, to exert them for the procurement of purposes, the elevation of Truth, the world's good of Mankind. But Green seems to refer to pride of another sort, pride of birth, station, circumstances, or something, I hardly know what. And yet this is great belief. To think of Genius, the sympathising, the affectionate, getting scattered and exclusive, —to imagine the heart-lighted face which I have looked in picture to my mind's eye, growing hard and haughty, and casting scornful glances toward the plebeian crowd! Out upon it! Even by the passing thought I have associated her noble nature. But I would have her like the Roman's wife, "chaste simplicity." I would have her guard the innocence of her intellect with a jealous eye, lest they should come to dull chart of their fading gold. In a word, I would have her take a prime place among the "female reformers" of the age. Do not be startled, gentlemen, I am no disciple of

OUR PREMIUM.

The date of October is here, and upon looking over our subscription list, we find the three following post towns have sent in the largest number of subscribers within the past year:

Salem, Ohio,	189
Clinton Hill, New York,	111
Greenfield, Mass.	105

We therefore award the premium to Salem. And as owing to our office, will send the Post gratis to all our subscribers in that town for one year, beginning at the expiration of their present subscription.

We now renew the offer for the next year. And trust that there will be more competition for it than there has been for the year just closed. Our readers will perceive here easily any one of a great number of towns could have taken the prize from Salem. The following are the terms of the offer:

A PREMIUM.

The Post Office at any town in the Union, from which we shall receive the greatest number of subscribers to the Saturday Evening Post, during the year between the 1st of November, 1848, and the 1st of November, 1849, (the papers to be mailed to each Post Office, or to subscribers through it,) shall be entitled to a continuance of the whole number of the subscriptions gratuitously, for one year after the expiration of the year for which their subscriptions shall have been paid.

The papers will be continued on, either to the subscribers themselves or to the agents through whom we may receive the orders for quantities, and to whom the package or packages may be directed, or to both, if there should be both in the same town, as the case may be.

LIBEL SUITS.

The following paragraph recently appeared in an editorial column of our respected contemporary, the City Item:

BEING FOR LIBEL.—We do not know of a more miserable, left handed, one-sided, cross-eyed, splenetic, bilious, contemptible business than that of suing an editor for libel. An individual the other day tried to fasten a libel upon Mr. M'Makin, of the Model American Courier, but he got nothing—no more and no less—for his pains. We have no doubt, however, he got just as much as he deserved.

The above is decidedly amusing, when taken in connection with the fact that Mr. M'Makin has instituted suits against a number of the editors and publishers of this city, for expressing their honest opinion upon his course relative to Mrs. Holden. At the same time that he has been crying out "persecution! persecution!" in his paper, he has been attempting, by means of the law of libel, to frighten the press into silence upon a matter which had come properly before it in the proceedings of a court of law. Now, if suing an editor be a "miserable, left-handed, one-sided, cross-eyed, splenetic, bilious, contemptible business" when Mr. M'Makin is sued, what is it when Mr. M'Makin is the sner?

But we are free to say that we do not consider suing an editor or publisher, always a "miserable, left-handed, cross-eyed, contemptible, &c., business." We think in some cases it is perfectly proper. If an editor takes advantage of his position to invade the sanctities of private life, rake up whatever false and malicious slanders may be circulated respecting the character of some one against whom he has a grudge, and give forth to the world them false and malicious accusations, it is right that he should be punished—and if the injured party could not obtain redress in a court of law, he would often endeavor to obtain it by personal violence. The power of the press is a fearful power, and the law of libel, properly and fairly construed and administered, is necessary to prevent its liberty from degenerating into licentiousness and tyranny.

But while guarding the press from licentiousness on the one side, we must not render it powerless and useless by too much constraint on the other. In this, as in almost everything else, the middle course is the wise one. If the press is forced to confine itself to respect and denunciation of vice merely in the abstract, its usefulness will be greatly impaired. For instance, if the press in commenting upon evidence given in a court of justice, or in a suit, be allowed to express its opinion upon the conduct of different parties, and the justice or injustice of the decision of the court, without being exposed to a suit for libel, upon men will feel less occupie in endeavoring to commit injustice by taking advantage of the quirks and uncertainties of the law, and corrupt judges have less fear of being exposed and degraded for palpably unjust decisions.

The general rule we would lay down then, is this. Affairs of a private nature, so long as they remain private, should not be dragged in public view by the press; but public affairs are those engaged in them, or private affairs which have become public by an appeal to the public tribunals, are fitting subjects of editorial remark and animadversion.

This we would lay down as the rule. But we do not mean to say that there are not cases, in one sense private, which are proper to bring before the public, in order to brand the actors in them with deserved ignominy. Instances where men holding high station in religious bodies, are known to be addicted to the most degrading vices, are cases of this kind. Even these, however, are properly subjects for the law of libel; the editor who exposes the offender, doing it at his peril. But the editor who puts himself in such a dangerous position, should not only be justified but held in high estimation, if he can prove before a jury of his countrymen, that he was impelled to the course he pursued by no motives of private vindictiveness, but by a regard for the welfare of society and the public good.

So much for libels in general. In relation to that instituted by Mr. M'Makin last spring against ourselves, all we have to say at present is, that notwithstanding the "bad" condemnatory of the course taken by Mr. M'Makin, until it came properly before us in the proceedings of a court of law; although we had heard all the particulars of the dispute, and of his most astounding claim to the sacred character of the Courier, long before. But not for anything we have said ourselves, has suit been instituted, but for allowing Mr. Neal, (one of the administrators of Mr. Holden's estate,) at the written request of Mrs. Holden, to publish in our columns a statement in answer to one put forth by Mr. M'Makin in the Courier. Thus for simply seeing fair-play between the parties, and allowing Mr. Neal for Mrs. Holden to reply to Mr. M'Makin, we have been sued for libel.

We therefore might also raise a cry of "persecution;" but it is too ridiculous. Any man may sue another, but it is a different thing to get a judgment in his favor; as Mr. M'Makin will find when his various suits against editors and publishers in this city, are brought to trial.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Among the strange advertisements that have appeared lately, the two following rather take the lead. The first is from a late number of the Louisville Journal:

A COW LOST.—Lost, strayed, or stolen, from the subscriber, a brindled cow and calf, for a return of which he will give any man, woman, or child, five dollars. Who will also embrace this opportunity to say to my numerous friends and acquaintances that I will be out of my power to attend any parties, suppers, or assemblies between this and next Christmas. They may therefore save themselves the trouble of sending me any invitations, as I will not have the will for the pleasure, and once for all consider all such invitations given and declined.

R. F. BAIRD.

R. F. Baird must be a gentleman of great social qualifications, we presume, and extremely in request for parties, balls, &c. There are some persons in this city, possessing similar accomplishments, who if they knew their own good, would publish a like advertisement—persons who are "their own worst enemies."

The following is of a different character. It originally appeared in the Springfield, Ohio, Republican. It seems that the advertisement of Lean had recently eloped with a Mr. Richard, or Dick, Logan. The mother's letter is a model of force and perspicuity:

TO DICK LOGAN.—If you want my girl, why don't you come and ask her? She is a gentleman, and not be making a fool of her! She can get plenty of better looking men than you. I want you to send back the clothes she left in your trunk, for the laundrily thinks hard of me about it.

If my daughter, Lizz Marklin, wants to marry an black man or Dick, let her come home and do the thing right. Lizz, your mother loves you bad, after doing so much for you, to have you do this way. Do come home. There's a fellow in Xenia now, nearly dying for you, and wants to marry you. He's a great deal better than Dick, and you'd better marry him.

ELIZA MACKLIN, Xenia, Ohio.

Whether "Lean" complied with her mother's request, we are unable to say. We are afraid, however, that by the time the letter reached her, she was Mrs. Dick Logan. In which case the "fellow in Xenia," who was "nearly dying" for her, and who was "a great deal better than Dick," *in

United States SATURDAY POST.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1848.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

From the accounts which look out from the Palace walls, and from various public demonstrations, it appears that "little Vic," like some other little women—not all, by a long ways—has quite an infirmity of temper. In other words, Victoria is what is generally termed a little spicy, a little hot in the mouth; and gives those around her, not even excepting Prince Albert himself, every now and then "a good setting down." In proof of this, witness the following anecdotes:

Col. Sherburne relates, according to the Boston Rambler, that while Victoria was on a visit to Brighton last year, a crowd gathered round to see her Majesty and the Prince when walking near the sea shore, the day after they arrived, which much annoyed the Queen, and turning to avoid the crowd, a young woman cried out, loud enough for the Queen to hear, "Why, sister Jane would make a better-looking Queen any day." The next morning her Majesty and suite were en route for London, since which the palace at Brighton has been stripped of its furniture, and all transferred to Osborne, Isle of Wight, also one hundred pounds annual grant to the Brighton Hospital stopped, and the Brighton Regatta Club deprived of the plate of one hundred guineas, which the Queen for years has regularly granted. So much for Sister Jane and Queen Victoria at Brighton.

Another account says: "Victoria is particularly strict and severe in her suppressions of French embellishment at her court. Starting lately for a ride on horseback, Prince Albert sprang into his saddle with a new whip in his hand. The head was of gold, designed and finished with the perfection in which Parisian art has attained.

"'What a beautiful whip!' said the Queen.

"'Yes—I received it this morning from Paris,' answered the Prince.

"'From Paris!' asked her Majesty, lowering her eyebrows, 'you have then forgotten my prohibition! Take that detestable object out of my sight, and I dispense with your company in my ride!'

"The Royal spouse retired, quite confused, and the whiff lasted till the next evening—an uncommon thing, as any one evening seldom lasts longer than a fortnight. It is supposed that disagreeable excitement of the irascible Victoria.

"At a recent drawing-room at Buckingham Palace, the superb Duchess of Sutherland, Lady of Honor to the Queen, incurred, in the same way, the sovereign displeasure. Her toilette was uncommonly elegant and fresh from Paris. The Queen turned to her with a very irritated look, and ironically felicitated her on the stylishness of her evening dress, adding, 'I have understood, Duchess, that your physician thinks the waters of Bath would be good for you. You can go there to-morrow; and, as you will have some preparations to make for your departure, you can be excused this evening.'

"The Duchess curtsied in silence and withdrew."

We think the Queen is right enough in giving the preference to articles manufactured by her own subjects, but it would be well if she could learn to discourage the use of articles of foreign make, a little more like a Queen, and not so much like a tartar.

FROM MEXICO.

The accounts from Mexico represent that country as being in a most distracted state. A revolutionary outbreak in favor of Santa Anna, in the city of Mexico, had been suppressed by the energy of the Government, the troops being promptly called out, and cannon planted in the streets. Horbide, and various other officers had been thrown into prison.

The inhabitants of Tampico have risen in insurrection, and expelled the troops. This movement is believed to be connected with the Sierra Madre project, which really begins to wear a serious aspect. Mr. Clifford, our Minister, has assured the Mexican Government that our own will oppose the project to the extent of its powers. One paper says—"God grant that these repeated protestations may be made in good faith!" Gen. Bustamente is to command the troops which are to attempt to stay the threatened dismemberment. They will amount in a few days to 4,000 men, it is said.

BOARD OF HEALTH.—The number of deaths during the last week in this city was 126—adults 51, and children 69.

Items of News.

DEATH OF MRS. ARMISTAD.—This lady, pronounced by the Duke of Cambridge, to be the most magnificent woman in her Majesty's dominions, died very suddenly on the 6th ult., at Birmingham. She had been suffering from a slight indisposition for about a fortnight, and it is supposed that disease of the heart was the cause of her death. She belonged to Norwich, and was 51 years of age. She weighed 31 stone 11 lbs., measured 4 ft. round the waist, 6 ft. round the bust, 7 ft. 1 in. round the hips, and 22 in. round the upper part of the arm.

AN IMPORTANT INVENTION.—The Winchester Republican has been shown the model of a furnace, (for which a patent has been taken out,) for the purpose of making malleable iron from the ore. It is said to be an invention of very great importance to iron manufacturers, calculated to produce a saving of $40 per ton over the present mode. It is the invention of Mr. Lorenzo Seibert, of Shenandoah county, an experienced manufacturer.

REDUCTION OF WAGES AT LOWELL.—We learn from the Boston Republican, that notice has been given at Lowell that a reduction of wages will soon take place. It is to commence on the 20th of November, on one corporation, and probably at the same time on the others. The reduction is considerable, 25 to 33 per cent. The speed is to be reduced, and the girls are to be made to lead more looms.

THE PROTECTOR UMBRELLA.—The novelty of the "protector" consists chiefly in the adoption of a screw handle, which when removed from the stick literally locks up the umbrella and renders it useless. In addition to this appropriation hitherto so liberally indulged in thus entirely prevented, for all that the real owner has to do to secure his property is to pocket the small handle. The invention is one of unusual interest.

ROME.—Amidst the revolutions in Europe, nothing has been heard of Rome, the celebrated enthusiast. He is preaching in Vienna, with his usual zeal and violence. He denounces the doctrines of the Trinity, confession, the Pope, the Cylinder of Saints, convents, monasteries, celibacy, the clergy, and praying in foreign tongues. He goes the whole figure of reform.—Morning Star.

DEAD LETTERS.—Upwards of two thousand dollars have been found enclosed in dead letters, received at the Dead Letter Department within a month. The average amount returned from this responsible branch of the Government to places where the owners are supposed to reside, is $60 per day. Of this an average sum of $50 per day is restored to the parties who transmitted it.

SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.—A good deal of interest has been excited by a report in England from Peel's River, that the Esquimaux have seen some vessels to the east of the Mackenzie River, which furnish hope that the long lost party of Sir John Franklin, in the Arctic seas, have conquered the elements, and may at this moment be in perfect safety.

SLAVE TRADE.—The Government of Brazil has been so annoyed by protests against the continuance of the slave trade, that means are devising to put an end to it. A commercial circular states that an earnest effort is now making by government to stop the trade to Africa, in which it is sustained and encouraged by public opinion.

THE HARDEST KIND OF A BLOW.—A correspondent of an exchange paper, writing from Key West, tells us that the severest blow he ever heard of. He says, "I forgot to mention the schooner John T. Sprague is reported, by persons just in from Tampa, blown a mile and a half up in the woods!" That will do.

HORSEINLE.—A child of Mr. Upham, in Hallowell, Me., was smothered to death on Friday morning week. The child was left in the morning on a bed, upon a turn-up bedstead, and forgetful of the fact, the father turned the bed up. In about half an hour the bed was taken down and the child found dead.

THE MORMON TEMPLE.—A company has purchased all the Mormon property in the bands of A. W. Babbitt, the Mormon agent at Nauvoo, including the walls of the Temple; and arrangements have been made to rebuild it as soon as possible. The price paid was twelve thousand dollars.

INDIA RUBBER LEGS.—A London inventor has applied vulcanized India rubber to the purpose of making artificial legs, which are said to be the most useful substitutes for a limb that has yet been devised. We should think they might almost restore the elasticity of youth.

CANADIAN EMIGRATING.—The Quebec Mercury says the emigration of the French Canadian population to the United States is largely on the increase. Many are selling out their property, and with the produce are moving westward with their household chattels.

HERRINGS.—The John O'Groat Journal calculates, that in the present season, 22,862 crans of herrings have been captured, and supposing that each cran holds 70 dozen, the total will have been, 6,487,760 dozen, or 77,852,920 herrings.

SMALL NOTES.—By a royal decree the Bank of Belgium is authorised to issue notes for some below fifty francs, to an amount to be decided upon by the Minister of Finance, in conjunction with the Bank.

General News.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

The French Colonists, who have already been sent to Algeria, will make together a body of 12,000 men, chiefly of those who took part in the Revolution of June, who have been deported. They will be divided among the settlements of Algiers, Oran and Constantine.

The weather in England has undergone a favorable change, and the harvests in Scotland had been got in with better success than for many years.

Accounts from Stockholm, 17th October, state that the Cholera had appeared at Konigsburg, Trafemond, Pilau and Lubeck, and that other harbors of Prussia proper were suspected.

When the post left, on the 7th, the city of Vienna was all in arms, and great excitement prevailed; but there seemed to be no disposition to perpetrate further outrage.

The Minister of Justice has been arrested and conducted to the University. The rest of the Ministers have concealed themselves, except Dobblhoff and Hornbostel. All the soldiers have left the town, and at present (afternoon) the fighting has ceased. One hundred and fifty persons are said to have been killed, and five hundred to six hundred wounded.

The intelligence from Naples and Sicily is more tranquillizing, but the belligerents, having been stayed in their career of destruction by France and England, heap upon both the most vindictive reproaches. The English ships of war seem especially obnoxious. The Sicilians are organizing a defence at every point, should the Neapolitan forces march on Palermo.

A deputation has waited on the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, touching the fate of Mr. O'Brien. The Lord-Lieutenant, it would seem, is favorable to mercy.

The Roman Catholic Bishops have refused to interfere in any appeal to the mercy of the Government in the cause of Smith O'Brien. The State prisoners have addressed Miss Power on her imprisonment for the National cause.

The Crown are at a great loss how to proceed against Mr. Meagher. The evidence appears to be incomplete. All that can be done to find the necessary proof of his treasonable sentiments and doings, is unavailing. It is thought that the trial will take place at Clonmel, at the present term.

Mr. Gavin Duffy's trial will commence in Dublin, at the Special Commission, in a few days. The Crown will make a most determined effort to convict him of high treason, and from all that is current, should it obtain such a verdict, prove relentless to mercy, inasmuch as it charges him with being the chief instigator of the Clubs, and the cause of O'Brien's misfortunes.

In the case of T. B. McManus, another of the rebels, the evidence and defence had been concluded, and a verdict of guilty returned. He was arrested at Cork, on his way as American ship, about to sail for an American port. It is alleged that, being on board an American ship, he was under the protection of the American flag, and that therefore the British Government had no power to arrest him.

A Litany and Prayer for penitents attacked by the Cholera, has been published in England, and meets with ready sale!

The new electric light is actually to come into use. The apparatus of Staite & Petrie will cost twenty pounds, but it will illuminate the largest buildings, or the smallest, at one ten-th the price of gas.

It is said that hares are liable to contract the small pox which foreign sheep have introduced among the flocks in the several districts of England.

The weather was so cold on the 29th of July last, at the Cape of Good Hope, that ice was formed half an inch in thickness.

It would seem that there are persons continually on the watch to see Prince Louis Napoleon. He is compelled to change his residence every day to avoid their intrusiveness.

Mr. Bancroft and lady have been on a visit to Lord Palmerston, at Broadlands.

One million, four hundred thousand persons, or one-thirteenth of the whole population of Great Britain, was supported by the poor rates in 1846.

The number of vagrants who are relieved with a night's lodgings, supper and breakfast, at the public expense, in England, has risen from the number of 206 in 1839, to 41,742 in 1847.

Roasted coffee is said, by its powerful vapor, completely to render harmless most vegetable and animal effluvia. So says the Medical Times.

Prince Albert and Queen Victoria were on the Highlands, one day tied the veil of her bed under her chin, as it was rather chilly weather. Forthwith every lady, "the country round," adopted the style, and in the hottest days of the season were loyally smothered away in honor of the royal dame.

LAW AND ALE.—A Manchester landlord recently levied for rent upon the studio of his tenant, a sculptor, of the name of Clarke, and sold under the hammer about £100 worth of busts for £18. It was proved that the auctioneer sold the head of John Wesley for that of Voltaire; one of Charmey, as "a bald headed chap;" that of Rofferlie, as "a long haired show boy;" and that of Sir Chas. Bell, as Dead Birkbeck. The jury, indignant at the oppression of the landlord, the ignorance of the auctioneer, and the desecration of the arts, gave the sculptor £300 damages!

THE GREAT SEA SERPENT.—When the Dædalus frigate, Captain M Quahae, arrived at Portsmouth, was on her passage home, between the Cape of Good Hope and St. Helena, her captain, and most of her officers and crew, at four o'clock one afternoon, saw a sea serpent. The creature was twenty minutes in sight of the frigate, and passed under her quarter. Its head appeared to be about four feet out of the water, and there was about sixty feet of its body in a straight line on the surface. It is calculated that there must have been under water a length of thirty or forty feet more. The diameter of the reptile's body appeared about sixteen inches, and when it extended its jaws, which were full of large jagged teeth, they seemed sufficiently capacious to admit of a tall man stand ing upright between them.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.—There resides in Delaware, some few miles from Tomprivville, in this County, a respectable farmer, having a daughter now about eleven years old, who, until changing her teeth last year, labored under an impediment of speech, which was thought to be incurable. At that time, for some trifling indiscretion, her mother spoke quickly and sharply to her and boxed her ears, and singular to relate, from the moment her ears rang with the blow she never uttered a word. At the expiration of that time, however, when the afflicted mother had become almost fearful of her supposed instrumentality in depriving her child of even her impaired speech, this faculty was again restored—and what is still more incomprehensible, without the slightest impediment or any kind—a blessing which she has uninterrupted by enjoyed to the present time.—Centreville (Maryland) Times.

SHARP STORK.—A correspondent from Marshfield writes as follows:—"About the 2nd of the last month, a black stork was discovered in North River in Marshfield, and some two or three boats made in him and succeeded in driving him on a shoal, which irritated him so much that he turned back and upon being pursued rather too closely by some of the party who was alone in a boat, his shackles majesty raised himself sufficiently high out of the water to fall upon the boat, which gave it such a shock as to throw the man out, who alighted immediately on the shark's back. Not liking such a steed, the individual sprang for the boat, and seeing his harpoon, quickly despatched him and got him on shore. The shark measured between ten and eleven feet.—Plymouth Rock.

EMIGRATIN ON TEXAS.—A Dublin letter to the London Chronicle announces the approaching departure of an emigrating body of superior class for Texas, including "some persons in the rank of gentry," one gentleman, who has been a member of Parliament, three justices of the peace, persons heretofore connected with mercantile and banking establishments, and a number of well to-do farmers. A clergyman of the Established Church will accompany the party, with the design to become their pastor in the new home to which they are going, where the lands intended to be occupied have already been purchased. This movement seems to attract some attention at the beginning of a "break-up" among the gentry and the middle class.

HAGGIS NOT HAGGISHLY.—The Day Book operates eyes to a remarkable fact, viz.: that the individual upon whom we have been expending our sympathy, under the name of Haggis, is not the great leader of the liberal party in Germany, but somebody else. "Thus it," says the Day Book, "is a very distinguished German patriot and liberal named Heckscher, who has been one of the most eminent leaders in the reforms which have been recently effected in the federal system of Germany, in the Congress at Frankfort. He is a genuine and devoted friend of liberty, and is honored as such there and throughout Europe."

O'BRIEN'S AUTOGRAPH.—The Correspondent of the Waterford Mail says that a gentleman applying on Thursday to Mr. Smith O'Brien, for his autograph, which was at once given, accompanied by a line of poetry. It is short, graphic, and certainly bespeaks anything but drooping spirits or a sense of guilt. Here it is:

"Whether on the gallows high,
Or in the battle's van,
The fairest place for man to die
Is where he dies for man
"WILLIAM SMITH O'BRIEN."

A QUEER LUXURY.—Sturgeon, or "Albany Beef," as it is termed in ridicule, is being taken in large quantities near Albany, for European markets, where it sells at twenty dollars per barrel, being esteemed a great luxury. The Albanians have such a contemptible opinion of this fish, that it sells in their market at five dollars a barrel, or three cents a pound, although really a most delicious food. Thus it is. Luxuries are esteemed only when they are obtained at great expense and brought from a distance. That which we have in abundance, or can obtain cheaply, we too often pass by as worthless.

☞ Mr. Gillmore, of the New York and New Hampshire Road, has invented a Time Table, adapted for use on that road. The distances and time of running are so graduated that the proper position of a train, at any particular time, may be seen at a glance.

Political Intelligence

LETTER FROM GENERAL TAYLOR.

The Galveston News, of the 14 ultimo, publishes the following letter from General Taylor, in regard to the discharge of the Texas Volunteers, before the battle of Monterey:

[Private.] BARON ROCHE, July 24, 1848.

SIR:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your friendly communication of the 7th instant, in relation to the statement represented by Gen. Henderson, in a speech recently delivered by him, to have been made by me to the Secretary of War, respecting the discharge of the Texas Volunteers, shortly before the battle of Monterey.

In reply to your inquiries on this point, I have to say, that the terms of the remarks attributed to me by General Henderson are incorrect, and that if General Rusk, or any one else, saw such language over my signature in the War Office, it must have been put there by himself. I enclose you, however, the extract from the communication to the Secretary of War, to which I presume General Henderson refers, and you can therein see the language used on the occasion.

The discharge of the Texas troops there referred, was ordered by me at their own solicitation, in which Gen. Henderson himself joined; and agreeably to a promise made to them at Camargo. The misconduct alluded to in this extract, consisted in the depredations committed by some of them upon the inhabitants of Monterey and its vicinity, after the capitulation of the town; and whatever might have been the language which General Henderson held to these troops respecting their conduct, it was quite certain that there was no one who used, when addressing me on the subject, severer or harsher language in denunciation of it, than did he and the officers about his person. I am, therefore, no less surprised than mortified on the General's account, to learn that he is attempting to torture, for the purpose of injuring me, an official statement of mine, made to the Secretary of War, in the discharge of my duties to the Government, in the justice of which statement I believe that he fully concurred at the time, and which was at all events, partly based upon information officially laid before me by himself.

I have no right, of course, to object to the General's political hostility to me, if it cannot refrain from expressing, in conclusion, the regret that in yielding to his feelings on this score he should have become so strangely forgetful of events and circumstances of comparatively recent occurrence.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, Z. TAYLOR.

POLITICAL ITEMS.

Mr. Duncan, of Ohio, the unsuccessful Whig candidate, will contest the seat of his Democratic competitor, who is elected by fraud.

The Vermont House of Representatives has passed the bill providing for the election of Presidential Electors by a plurality, and it is now a law.

It appears that Mr. Simms, the late Representative, in the place of Rhett, resigns in the Georgetown District, South Carolina, over Mr. McQueen, by 79 majority.

The Charleston Mercury says that of the one hundred and sixty-eight members of the Legislature of South Carolina, not more than thirty will vote for the Taylor Electoral Ticket, if indeed such a ticket is voted for at all.

THE OFFICIAL RESULT IN OHIO.—The Ohio State Journal of Tuesday, furnishes the official vote for Governor, from all the Counties in the State, save three, and in these three the vote is authentically known and given. From these returns there is a majority of 127 for Gen. Seabury Ford, and he is the Governor elect of the State of Ohio. As to the Legislature, the Cincinnati Times says:—"The City Members have Certificates. The Clerk yesterday issued a certificate of the election of Spencer and Rouse, the Whig members of the House from the city. This secures the Whig majority in the House, provided the returns now in are not changed by the official report."

GIDDINGS' SUCCESS.—The following is the vote for Governor, and Congressmen in the 20th District of Ohio, at the late election:

Counties.	Ford.	Weller.	Giddings.	Giddings.	Giddings.
Ashtabula.	3,465	996	2,668		1,180
Geauga.	2,200	1,250	2,028		1,275
Trumbull.	2,900	907	2,614		1,000
Lake.	1,056	710	1,297		50
Total.	10,121	4,828	8,776		1,629
Ford's majority, 5,317. Giddings' majority, 2,371.

Mr. Giddings is an Anti-Taylor Whig, and goes for Free Soil and Van Buren.

MINUTE EXPENSES OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.—The following curious statement is going the rounds:

The expenditures, per minute, of Washington's administration were $3.80
Adams, the elder 6.20
Jefferson 8.50
Madison 14.30
Monroe 15.80
Adams, the younger 24.10
Jackson 33.10
Van Buren 50.70
Polk 115.90

FREE SOIL IN NORTH CAROLINA.—The Convention of the Free Soil Democrats of this State met at Jamestown, Guilford County, on the 13th, ultimo. About a hundred persons were present, nearly Quakers. Messrs. Stafford and Cowles made speeches. The Register says that, besides the Quakers, a great number of Democrats and a few Whigs are engaged in the movement. The Greensborough Patriot strongly deprecates the movement, but outlines to the belief that Van Buren will receive a pretty large vote from the Locofocos and the Anti-Slavery Democrats and Whigs.

Clippings.

☞ A number of respectable young women who are tailoresses, have taken a shop in Liberty Street, New York, and have set up for themselves.

☞ A sum of money exceeding two thousand dollars has been received at the Dead Letter Office, in Washington City, within the last ninety days, nearly the whole of which has been safely returned to those who transmitted it.

☞ "Mother, what is a Whig?" "Hush, hush, my child, it is a word we never mention in this family." "Why, mother, I thought it was a good word, for I heard Father say that you was only a Whig before you married him."

☞ "Do your fall hurt you?" said one Pottsdealer to another, who had fallen from the top of a two story house. "Not in the least, honey, 'twas stopped so quick that hurt me."

☞ Dr. C. C. Yates, an eminent physician, formerly of New York and Albany, has died in Nova Scotia, at an advanced age. Dr. Yates was the husband of Mrs. Willard, the celebrated teacher, of Troy, with whom he lived but a short time after their marriage.

☞ A Mr. Wigg certifies, in one of the daily papers of our city, to the excellence of Jayne's hair tonic. This tonic must be good if it makes the hair of a wig grow.

☞ There are fifteen flouring mills at Oswego, with eighty run of stones, and can grind 32,000 bushel of wheat per day.

☞ A gentleman who has occasion to walk with two ladies under one umbrella, should always go in the middle himself—that secures a dry coat to himself, and is showing no partiality to either of the ladies.

☞ Whilst the United States frigate St. Lawrence was off Southampton, she failed to salute the English Admiral's flag, when passing through Spithead. This omission is much commented on.

☞ If you multiply any giving number by itself, say 8,—thus say 8X8=64, then take one from the multiplier and add it to the multiplied, the product will always fall short by one of the former product. Thus:—from 8—7, one added to 8—8; 7X9=63.

☞ The most industrious collectors of literary remains are trunk makers—a useful body of men.

☞ The editor of the St. Louis Reveille has been shown a sweet-potato measuring four feet four inches in length, and five inches in circumference.

☞ J. Bayard Taylor, whose "Views a-Foot" have passed through several editions, has in press a collection of his Poems.

☞ Two officers and two mulattoes, elected for Guadaloupe, have taken their seats in the French National Assembly.

☞ A plan has been commenced for establishing, in the Episcopal Church, an order of "Sisters of Charity." No vows are to be required, and the object is said to be to train nurses for hospitals.

☞ Mr. Morse's Patentees have asked a further injunction against O'Reilly. It appears that since the latter's Southern Line has been prevented from making usage as a means of telegraphic communication, the operators telegraph by the sounds, or chickings of the instrument.

☞ He who cocks his hat on one side is a bully or a coward; he who wears it thrown backwards is a dandy; he who wears it on his head is a fool; he who wears his hat forward is a banterer and a sneerer, and he who half buries his eyes beneath his castor, is a rogue.

The captious chap who uttered that,
Had either no head or no hat.

☞ We once knew a boy who said that he liked "a good rainy day; too rainy to go to school, and just about rainy enough to go a fishing."

☞ "Tell your father," said John Randolph to a young friend, "that I recommend abstinence from novel reading and whiskey punch. Depend upon it, sir, they are both equally injurious to the brain."

☞ The great cry with everybody is, Get on get on—just as if the world were travelling post. How astonished people will be when they arrive in Heaven, to find the angels, who are so much wiser than they, laying no schemes to be made archangels!

"OH, LADY MAY how is it that
Those who are now so smart and bright
It seems to me that's not the fact
I looked upon the other night."

☞ Mary Walker recovered, recently, $3,500 of the Buffalo and Niagara Falls Railroad Company, for the death of her husband, caused by upsetting the cars.

☞ "What a beautiful place Heaven is!" exclaimed a little boy. "Why do you think so?" asked his father. "Because," said he, alluding to the stars, "the nails in the floor are so beautiful!"

☞ Mrs. Trollope has written a new novel, called "The Countess."

☞ "The Cap of Liberty" is the name bestowed by Mrs. Trollope on a widow's cap! Mrs. Trollope, we believe, a widow?

☞ A regiment of American soldiers, under control of Colonel White, has gone into the service of Yucatan. This accounts for the recent success of the Whites over the Indians, we suppose.

☞ The Rhode Island Republican, of the 19th ult., says some small sales of hogs have been made at $2.50 a $3 per cwt. Buyers generally decline giving this price.

☞ They are as fond of titles in the East as in the great West. Among his other high sounding titles, the King of Ashantee is styled "Lord of twenty-four umbrellas." This looks as if he had prepared himself for a long reign.

☞ Jenny Lind's two nights at Manchester realized upwards of £2,000. She was equally as attractive as ever.

☞ If you are determined to commit suicide in consequence of poverty, do the deed early in the morning instead of late at night, and you will save the expense of three meals.

DR. JOHNSON'S OPINION OF EDITORS.—The great "literary Colossus" speaks as follows of the difficulties and perplexities of editorial life:—"I know no class of the community more to be much disinterested benevolence and thankless labor are expected as from editors of newspapers. They are expected to feel for every one but themselves—to correct public abuses, and private ones also, without provoking offence, to do the difficulties of others, without regard to their own; to expose improper measures of every one and no one at the same time. They are expected to note everything that is important or extraordinary; and notwithstanding their diversity of men's opinions, their notice must be calculated to please every one and at the same time offend no one."

FRUIT.—Walter Goodale, of South Orrington, in a communication in the Bangor Whig, on the subject of raising fruit, says: "I never knew a boy to steal fruit whose father raised it himself; and I believe, of all persons who own land and boys, if you wish to make them honest set out trees, and let them see that it costs something to raise fruit."

FRANKLIN INSTITUTE EXHIBITION.—This exhibition on Saturday evening last, after being visited during the two previous days by an immense concourse of our citizens and strangers. The display is not so extensive as that of last year, but contains many costly and elegant articles exhibited. Among the thousands of useful and ornamental specimens of labor now on exhibition, the following articles will receive more attention than the elegant plates of the Publisher, which are worth the price of admission. Mr. Francis Mahon, of No. 211 Chestnut street, and the two excellent lingerie-types suspended beneath Fashions combination are admirable drawn and exceedingly well executed. The figures are life size, the color, the cut and pattern of material and the whole general effect upon the artists who executed them, are in the highest degree creditable to the artists, Messrs. Lind and Magee Rose, and the other fair weight, and excellent, specimen of the Publisher's art, is a portrait for the Presidency, Cass and Taylor. The discovery of the Publisher, Mr. Mahon, is well expressed for Mr. Mahon, and they are pronounced very beautiful, and perfect fac similes of the originals. Mahon's specimen is a very fine piece of work, and superior to all others in this country, and, in fact, in the opinion of many, it is equal to any of the specimens of easily acquired and master talent, everywhere, we mean, prefer Mr. Mr's system to that of any other publisher.—Alexandria (Va.) Gazette.

Bank Note List.

CORRECTED FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY E. DUNLAP, BROKER, No. 44 South Third Street, Philadelphia, November 1848.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Par in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Lancaster, Harrisburg, Chester, Gettysburg, Carlisle, Reading, Easton, Bedford, Pottsville, Wyoming, Washington, Lewistown, Chambersburg, Doylestown, Lebanon, Susquehanna county, Towanda, Hanover, Harrisburg, West Branch, Wyoming, Middletown, Northampton, Schuylkill Haven, Brownville, Relief notes, 11 dis.

NEW JERSEY.—Trenton, Hightstown, Burlington, Bordentown, Mendham, Plainfield, par.

Newark, Newtown, Morristown, Rahway, Belvidere, Hackettstown, Perth Amboy, Bridgeton, Freehold, Toms River, Princeton, Camden, Salem, par.

NEW YORK.—Bank of Hudson, Bank of Niagara, Bank of Rochester, Bank of Utica, Bank of Syracuse, Bank of Troy, Bank of Ithaca, Bank of Auburn, Bank of Lockport, Bank of Genesee, Bank of Oswego, Bank of Chautauque, Bank of Buffalo, Bank of Niagara Falls, Bank of Lewiston, Bank of Canandaigua, Bank of Geneva, Bank of Ogdensburgh, Bank of Saratoga, Bank of Salina, Bank of Utica, Bank of Watertown, Bank of Rome, Bank of Troy, Bank of Hudson

Selected Poetry.

OH! FOR A SWEET, DEEP DREAM.

BY MRS. TOWNSHEND.

Oh! for a sweet, deep dream!
Then I again might view
That we together by the hearth sat down,
Or by the lattice, where the moonlight came,
Or through the trees gleam,
Wandered at dusk, and talk on in the days of yore.

Is there in earth or heaven,
Or in the realms of hell,
Power that can restore to my heart again
Which on my soul's dark night
Rose like a cuttlefish
We gazed by cooling step and watcher's silent side?

Yes, for every day fix,
Years seem of days gone by;
Those rolling stream—those waving, deep-green woods,
And we shall never more
Upon that bound sea shore,
Lay those wild working winds sing to the roaring floods.

Oh! Pain, how strong art thou!
Strong by night and by day
My deathless love, my unrequited despair;
We cannot break the chain
We ne'er shall meet again—
We can but pine for all we never more may gaze upon.

Oh! Milk, how little worth!
Oh! weary, weary Earth!
Oh! Love, so strong, yet weak; oh! fond, fond heart.
One end alone remains
To all our bitter pains,
To die as we have lived—loving—but far apart!

THE LILIES OF THE FIELD.

BY JAMES HENDERSON.

Both at the dawn upraise in silver chalice,
While day-spring colors in the dewy morn—
Gems that make bright the environ-crowned valleys,
Dispersed, but sound and mountain gem adorn!
God said, "Let there be light!" and lo, creation
Shone forth with smiles unprecedented and fair,
Then man had Eden for a habitation,
And yet, bright children of the spring, were there!

Ye came to bless the eye when sin had clouded
The glorious earth with rain pale and wan;
Ye came to cheer the heart when sin had shrouded
With pall dark and dread the face of man!
Ye came to whisper with your living beauty
A lesson to the heart that doubting sway;
To win the spirit to a trusting duty,
And gentle to your Father's steps in wisdom's way!

What though your accents, gentle, sweet, and lowly,
Unto the silent ear no sound impart?
Ye whisper words all eloquent and holy,
To wake the finer feelings of the heart!
Meekly ye tell your celestial story
Of the Creator's love with pulses true,
For Solomon, with all his pomp and glory,
Was ne'er arrayed like any one of you!

Ay, ye have lessons for the wise, revealing
Truths that proclaim Jehovah's boundless love;
And wisdom then grown wiser, nobler, feeling
How all dwelt upon, and cared for, from above!
Ye teach the thoughtful soul with your emotion,
When contemplation doth your beauties scan!
Ye fill the heart with calm, serene devotion,
And breathe a sweet note evring oun!

Selected Sketch.

FROM THE LADIES' GARLAND.

GRANDFATHER TYRO'S LECTURE.

BY MRS. LYDIA JANE PEIRSON.

"Here's an excellent thing in the newspaper, wife!" said Uncle John Tyro, looking up with a mischievous expression on his broad face.

Aunt Patience did not lift her eyes from the garment which she had spread upon her lap, and to a rent in which she was busily adapting a suitable patch, but she replied—

"That is a good paper, husband, and contains many excellent articles. Read the one in question, if you please."

"Oh," he cried, "I have got past it now; but it was about three things that never get rusty—the first is a good husband, the third—a woman's tongue."

The flush on Aunt Patience's meek face deepened perceptibly, as she answered in a low tone—

"The editor who admits such articles into his columns is affected with a bad heart or a weak head; and cannot be aware how the tones of affection from the tongue of mother, sister, wife or daughter."

"Oh! he! I thought this was a 'good paper!'" cried Uncle John. "But you make it good, anyhow. Your lessons will never grow rusty!"

Aunt Patience crumpled her work into her basket, lighted an extra candle and left the room. But as she turned to shut the door, a big tear on her cheek flashed in the candle-light like a diamond.

Old Grandfather Tyro sat in his easy chair, amid the soft cushions which Aunt Patience had stitched and stuffed for him, and comfortable in the easy clothes and soft woollens, which her dexterous hand had fashioned for his use. He had drawn his white pipe as she went out, and thus addressed Uncle John:

"My son, listen to me now a little while. I shall not be with you long, to counsel or reprove. I do not often lecture you, but now I must speak. You are not naturally wicked or cruel, and yet you have wantonly indicted a cruel injury on the heart of an excellent and unoffending person. She said right—any man who, by publishing such an article, adds a thong to the scourge of tyranny, ought never to bear the name of honest man. Man has robbed woman of every independent right and privilege—and standing with his foot upon her neck, calls and reviles because he cannot take from her the freedom of speech also. Don't interrupt me, John, I am speaking for your good, so you must listen. But tell me, did Patience ever reprove you when you did not deserve reproof—did she ever advise but for your good—did she ever complain without just and sufficient reason? Reflect and answer.

"It is well—she never did. And I am confident that few women ever did. Mark me—I say women—not children or idiots. Why is it, then, that the spirit of man rises so indignantly against the voice of woman? In the beginning God said, 'It is not good for the man to be alone.' 'Let us make an help-meet for him.' Certainly, then, the Allwise created woman, a meet or suitable companion for man. But man has made her a slave—the man opposite to the helpmeet of all slaves. I read a few weeks since in a newspaper published at Utica, and entitled Christian Contributor, an article headed 'Charles Manly and his slave Primose.' The writer, in sketching the affectionate intercourse between Charles Manly and his slave, has depicted the most perfect and tender conjugal love. There is not a wife living who might not envy the situation of that slave; or say, 'oh, that my master were so indulgent and affectionate as his.' And yet the writer of that article lamentes over the fate of a fellow creature, and says, 'all inflicted bondage is wrong against the highest life of man, and ever an usurpation and abuse of the prerogative of God. Wherever a faculty is given, its freedom is implied. God never gave a power without the charter for its legitimate exercise, in accordance with the functions of the whole being, and wherever in any way mutilation smother's life, is in open rebellion against the sovereign will of Heaven.' I wondered, as I read that sentence, whether the writer had his foot upon a woman's neck while he was writing it. If he is a husband, must probably he has a human being in venous bondage than that of the slave Primose, whose life is, as he says, mutilated, and from whom he would gladly wrest even the freedom of choice.

"I was a young and thoughtless man once, John, and your mother was one of the best of wives and mothers. Yet, John, I made her a real slave, and fretted her tongue as you do that of your Patience. She brought me a good property, I was prosperous, and in a few years, I was wealthy. Yet remember when we lived in the great house and kept our carriage and horses. Well, I was persuaded to join in that foolish speculation which proved my ruin. My faithful wife besought me to have nothing to do with it, warning me that it would be our undoing. 'Mind your own business, woman,' I exclaimed, 'what do you know of such matters.' 'I know,' she replied, 'that those who look on, generally see deeper into the game than the players, and we do something day given business. I think it is my business whether I have a home and bread for myself and children.' 'Hold your foolish tongue,' I cried, in a pet. 'I will not be dictated to by a woman. I have always provided for you, and shall do so still. (See what a falsehood—I had only farmed her money—but I knew she would never allude to that. We have got her sex under such nice subjection, that they dared such allusions wholly out of character.) Well, I went on, and we utterly failed. Your mother died from grief and without a shelter or bread for herself and children. She did not reproach me then—she even endeavored to console and encourage me; but I knew that I had wronged her, and I felt that she should feel toward me as I would have felt toward her in the like circumstances; and so I added insult and abuse to her other wrongs. If she was sad, I bade her speak the curse she was harboring against me; when she endeavored to be cheerful, I upbraided her for want of sympathy with my troubles. For awhile I tried to preserve composure, but could not add myself. I was too proud to be indebent to labor; and then I gave up to hypochondria, and became a plague spot upon society. Then your poor mother took to work, and as amend a bishop, but only for herself and little one, but for me who had condemned her advice, thrown away her property, and added to these every kind of abuse. Yet I saw no merit in all this because she was a woman. It would have been strange if she had loved otherwise. Of course her faith and great patriotism, she had replied to all that by my wilful mismanagement of her property, she would have been an absolute creature, an unfaithful wife, a virago, and every other hateful thing, which tyranny has invented of epithets to frighten women from rebellion. I

"At length your poor mother fell sick. Then I found myself, without employment at good wages, and in some sense comfortable and thoughtful. But my poor wife's heart was broken, and her life flickered, yet persistently enduring still, and yielding daily every energy to educate and train her children. I listened to think, to reflect, to reason and to analyze; and I think God, I became a wiser and a better man. But this wisdom was dearly bought, and I bring, instead of wilfulness and blind unreasoning prejudice. I would save you from these sufferings, my son. I would have you become wise, without passing under the rod of experience, the lashes of which have wounds that linger one for bewhile.

"Now, mark me, John, all the errors and sufferings of my life sprung from my having imbibed the false and wicked notion of woman's mental inferiority, a notion which some men, and writers of the present day, are exerting themselves (Heaven only knows why,) to establish and maintain. But work men are, in my opinion, either actuated by a mean jealousy of female rivalry in the walks of literature, or having satisfied themselves with under-written women, desert all the rest of the same class. Who but a foolish or bad-hearted man could thus condemn one full half of God's creatures, having never given them opportunity to prove themselves above the imputation? Look around you, John. Begin with your own children, and widen the search as far as your knowledge extends. Are the boys, as a general rule, superior in intellect to the girls? You admit that the superiority is in favor of the girls; but philosophers say girls are not capable of so great attainments as men. This remains to be proved. If girls, instead of being made wives and mothers at the age of from fourteen to eighteen, when boys are barely deemed capable of being apprenticed to tailors or sent to academies, were allowed to continue in the halls of science, man's boasted superiority would soon be at an end perchance—but bound as she is to domestic drudgery, and the care and attendance of our children, the ambrosia, to which woman does sometimes attain, is wonderful, and a proof of wonderful abilities.

"The world is making a great noise about female education—erecting seminaries, and publishing books expressly for that purpose; thus giving a small smattering of science, and a few showy accomplishments, mixed up with a mass of false doctrines and fastidious nonsense. I would have woman study as man study. Books which are not fit for her eye, are only fit for the fire. It is assumed to be unnecessary for her to be versed in natural history, theology, political economy, or the arts—but who should comprehend the laws of nature if not they, who are to be the mothers of all future life? Who should have knowledge of God, if not they who are to plant the seeds of immortal piety in all future intellect? Who should be versed in the economy of civil government, if not they who are destined to form the minds of all the sages, patriots, heroes, poets, orators, and statesmen of futurity? Who should be read it the arts, if not they who are to give the first impulse to the agriculturist, the mechanic, and artisan to the end of time? I'll tell you what; man may boast as he pleases, but woman sustains the weight of the world. Permit her to enjoy the benefits of sound and liberal education, and barbarism, bigotry, and superstition will never more pollute the earth with their foot-prints of blood, fire, and ashes.

"I once heard an old man remark—'the less a woman knows, the better wife she is;' and I believe all where holders preach the same doctrine, and the present deplorable condition of the human race is wholly owing to the incapacity of the mothers of the past and present world to educate their children aright. An incapacity chargeable not on them, but on the tyranny which has kept them chained to its footstool.

"Of late phrenology has attempted to mark a difference between the male and female head, and so establish woman's inferiority. But this attempt is hardly worthy of notice, as any person, having two eyes and common sense, can look at the heads of his wife, his children, or neighbors, or any assembly of the two sexes, and satisfy themselves at once that God or nature has made no such distinction—that women, taken as a class, have heads as large in proportion to their bodies, as men have, and that taking a given number of each, there are as many 'intellectual heads' amongst the women as men.

"I am aware that this is unfashionable doctrine, but it must be preached and will be proved; for woman has not attained that advantage in point of intellect which she has been forced to possess. Yes, she must either be crushed back to the old ignorance and servitude, or be permitted to take that station in the intellectual world for which she is fitted and intended by our Creator. She cannot be much longer be made to believe that her sex her being is to court admiration and secure a husband; but having nobler ends in view, will only carry when she focus, and will love only a worthy object. Domestic felicity will then be perfect. Man will not flatter spoiled and petted children into matrimony, and then hold themselves aggrieved because the marriage rite has not changed them to sensible and experienced women.

"Some person says—'what a hideous anomaly a female physician and lawyer must be.' But I find that those women have undertaken to study medicine in the regular manner, and I rejoice and applaud them as pioneers in a holy cause. The insidious delicacy which is aghast at the idea of a woman studying medicine, feels no qualm in witnessing her wife and daughter in the practice of male physicians—a thing at once barbarous and revolting to every idea of common decency. I count your good wife say, that the dread of being attended by a doctor was more terrible to her than all the sufferings of her sickness.

"The idea of female lawyers or counsellors is counted at as a ridiculous absurdity, and yet women are forced to attend courts as witnesses, &c., and sometimes suffer more than martyrdom in many instances, from giving evidence before men, who enjoy their distress, and increase it by every possible means.

"You may preach that woman has no just cause to complain of her position. I tell you she is every way oppressed. Her husband is lord of her person and property. If he abuse the one, and squander the other, to whom shall she appeal? The laws were framed by men, and are administered by men, who, having never experienced, cannot justly appreciate the evils of which she complains, and who are almost always biased against her, 'it is no unwomanly for a wife to complain against her husband.' They are aware of this, and so suffer silently on, even unto death. Witness your poor departed wife."

Grandfather Tyro drew a deep sigh, lighted his pipe, and sunk back in his easy chair. Uncle John arose and went out, evidently affected—and I being acquainted with some two or three individuals who need the benefit of grandfather's lecture full as much as Uncle John did, brought out my old pen, and with the good old gentleman's aid, wrote it out in full. And here it is for their benefit solely. Let them read and profit by it. I shall charge them nothing.

CURIOUS ICELANDIC PLANTS.—Many of the plants of Iceland grow to an monstrual size, close to the hot springs. Thyme grows in the cracks of the basin of the Great Geyser, where every other plant is petrified; and a species of chara flourishes, and bears seed in a spring hot enough to boil an egg!

Science and Art.

GAS FROM WATER.

Sir Humphrey Davy said that "at some future time gas would be generated from water for general purposes, surpassing that of coal in brilliancy and purity." An apparatus has been invented in England, by Stephen White, for making gas from water and common resin or tar. The London Miner's Journal, in describing it, says that the gas is extremely pure, and in burning emits no smell or smoke. The apparatus is cheap, and the gas cheaper than that from coal. The following is a description of the method:—

"The apparatus consists of three retorts placed in a stove, two of which are filled with charcoal and thin pieces of iron, and the other with iron chains hanging from a center bar.—The two first retorts are for the decomposition of water, which is regularly supplied by means of a syphon pipe, passing through and into the centre of the retort; the water in passing through this heated material, becomes converted into pure hydrogen and pure oxide of carbon. It then passes into the third retort, to remove its dose of bi-carburet of hydrogen, which is prepared from common tar or melted resin, or similar substances passing or dropping on the red hot chains, from a syphon tube, which regulates the supply. This causes the tar, or melted resin, to throw off an abundance of bi carburet of hydrogen gas. The gases being mixed in this manner are immediately conveyed into the gasometer for use, without any purifying vessels whatever, some being required."

CHEMISTRY OF ANIMAL HEAT.—The perpetual combination of the oxygen of the atmosphere with the carbon of the food, and with the effete substance of the body, is a real combustion, and is supposed to be the cause of animal heat, because heat is constantly given out by the combination of carbon and oxygen; and, without a constant supply of food, the oxygen would soon consume the whole animal, except the bones.—Mrs. Somerville.

MEYNAR IN THE HUMAN BLOOD.—M. J. Millon has proved by analysis, that the blood of man constantly contains silex, manganese, iron, and copper. The copper and lead are not in a state of diffusion through the blood; they are fixed with the iron in the globules, and everything leads us to believe that they share with it organization and life.

Selected Articles.

MATERNAL COURAGE.

We have merely, if ever, met with a more striking example of maternal self-devotion, united with singular presence of mind, than is offered by the following circumstances which occurred two or three weeks ago in the State of New York. The minute which we give, one made, as will be perceived, from a letter written by the heroic mother herself to a friend, a few days after the event narrated had occurred.

Mrs. ——, accompanied by her daughter, a young girl about twelve years of age, and some young children with their nurses, went to visit ——cemetery. A favorite dog, named Carlo, was permitted to accompany them as escort, and the little ones were amused with his gambols as he ran and leaped by their side. On reaching the cemetery, Mrs. —— and her daughter were a little in advance of the rest of the party.

"When suddenly we were all arrested by the most horrible yelps from Carlo, who came plunging, writhing, and foaming, furiously mad. The dog took a circuit round, and as the shrieks went forth from ——, and ——, 'He is mad! he is mad,' I echoed, 'Yes, he is mad—run for your lives!' In the same breath I tore from my shoulders a large heavy blanket shawl, as my only defence. Carlo immediately made for Mary, who was running with all the speed possible. I shrieked, 'Mary, this you be prepared—turn as quick as thought.' At the same time, I kept nearly pace with the dog, and, as dear Mary turned, I enveloped him completely with my shawl, winding the corners (which I held in my hand for the purpose) closely round his neck. It was, of course, only for one moment I could hold him, but every instant counted, and enabled Mary to change her course, so that he was unable to pursue her in any direct line. But the instant he escaped from me, he made direct for her again, a frothy foam issuing from his mouth, accompanied by the most hideous yelps.

"The others had made their escape from the cemetery, and I was left alone among the dead, to contend with, and protect my child against a raging mad dog. Oh, who can imagine my feelings! Calm, and perfectly self-possessed, I remained, giving directions unceasingly to Mary, who followed them quicker than given. All the time the dog was at full speed, save when I muffled him with the shawl. It was only by Mary's making short turns and leaping upon palings that I had an opportunity to wind it round him at all. Several times he so nearly reached her as to raise his paws to spring up to the spot she occupied, and such time strength and thought was given to me to cover him with the shawl and wind it round his neck. Time also escaped, and we met. Even that, I fear, might have been too late, had he not fallen in a fit, from which he was never allowed to rise. His head was severed entirely from his body by the heavy blow of an axe, given by a strong arm, while Mary stood directly over him, upon a high fence, whither he had pursued her.

"One week has passed, and last night was the first time I have been able to shut out from my sight that furious dog, gnashing his jaws, uttering those horrid yelps, and foaming thick froth from his mouth, rushing after my poor child."

In the midst of the horrors of the scene, described with such simplicity and vividness, how touchingly sublime appears a mother's love. Again and again the mother offers her life in sacrifice for that of her child. Each time that the shawl was thrown around the furious animal, he might have turned upon that noble woman and made her his victim, yet still she persevered, and God in mercy made her the instrument of saving the life of her beloved daughter.

One word on the remarkable presence of mind here displayed. It is a quality which all should cultivate. It is invaluable in the hour of danger. And who knows when that hour may be at hand? The timid and irresolute are in imminent peril themselves, and entirely useless to others, while those who have learned to maintain a control over their thoughts, and to preserve presence of mind, are often made the happy instruments of saving those whom they love, from danger and from death.—Christian Chronicle.

CULTIVATION OF TASTE.

I cannot help taking notice of an opinion which many persons entertain, as if the taste were a separate faculty of the mind, and distinct from the judgment and imagination: a species of instinct by which we are struck naturally, and at the first glance, without any previous reasoning, with the excellencies or the defects of a composition. So far as the imagination and the passions are concerned, I believe it true that the reason is little consulted; but where disposition, where decorum, where congruity are concerned,—in short, wherever the best taste differs from the worst, I am convinced that the understanding operates, and nothing else; and its operations are in reality far from being always sudden, or when they are sudden, they are often far from being right. Men of good taste, by consistence, come frequently to change their early precipitate judgment, which the mind, from its aversion to neutrality and doubt, loves to form on the spot. It is known that the taste (whatever it is) is improved exactly as we improve our judgments, by extending our knowledge, by a steady attention to one object, and by frequent exercise. They who have not taken these methods, if their taste decides quickly, it is always uncertainly; and their quickness is owing to their presumption and rashness, and not to any sudden irradiation that in a moment dispel all darkness from their minds. But they who have cultivated that species of knowledge which makes the object of taste, by degrees and habitually, attain not only a soundness, but a readiness of judgment, as men do by the same methods on all other occasions. At first they are obliged to spell, but at last they read with ease and with celerity; but this celerity of its operation is no proof, that the taste is a distinct faculty. Nobody, I believe, has attended the course as a discussion which turned upon matters within the sphere of mere naked reason, but must have observed the extreme readiness with which the whole process of the argument is carried on, the grounds discovered, the objections raised and answered, and the conclusions drawn from premises, with a quickness altogether as great as the taste can be supposed to work with; and yet where nothing but plain reason either is or can be suspected to operate. To multiply principles for every different appearance is useless, and unphilosophical too in a high degree.—Burke.

ENCOUNTER WITH A PRAIRIE WOLF.

I have never known these animals, rapacious as they are, extend their attacks to man, though they probably would if very hungry, and a favorable opportunity presented itself. I shall not soon forget an adventure with one of them, many years ago, on the frontiers of Missouri. Riding near the prairie border, I perceived one of the largest and fiercest of the gray species, which had just descended from the wood, and seemed famished to desperation. I at once prepared for a chase; and being without arms, I caught up a cudgel, when I betook me valiantly to the charge, much stronger, as I soon discovered, in my cause than in my equipment. The wolf was in no humor to flee, however, but boldly met me full half-way. I was soon disarmed, for my club broke upon the animal's head. He then "laid to" my horse's legs, which, not relishing the conflict, gave a plunge, and sent me whirling over his head, and made his escape, leaving me and the wolf at close quarters. I was no sooner upon my feet than my antagonist renewed the charge; but being without weapon, or any means of awakening an emotion of terror, save through his imagination, I took off my large black hat, and using it for a shield, began to thrust it towards his gaping jaws. My ruse had the desired effect; for after springing at me a few times, he wheeled about, and trotted off several paces, and stopped to gaze at me. Being apprehensive that he might change his mind and return to the attack, and conscious that, under the compromise, I had the best of the bargain, I very consistently—took to my heels, glad of the opportunity of making a dreary game, though I had myself given the challenge.—Journal of a Santa Fe Trader.

A HELP TO ENERGY.

To-day I found myself compelled to do something which was very disagreeable to me, and which I had long deferred. I was obliged to resort to my "grand expedient" in order to conquer my aversion. Yet will laugh when I tell you what this is; but I find it a powerful aid in great things as well as small. The truth is, there are two men who are not sometimes capricious, and yet whose vacillating. Finding that I am not better than others in this respect, I invented a remedy of my own, a sort of artificial resolution respecting things which are difficult of performance—a means of securing that firmness in myself which I might otherwise want, and which man is generally obliged to seek from some external prop. My device, then, is this:—I give my word of honor most solemnly to myself to do, or to leave undone, this or that. I am of course exceedingly cautious and discreet in the use of this expedient, and exercise great deliberation before I resolve upon it; but when once it is done, even if I afterwards think I have been precipitate or mistaken, I hold it to be perfectly irrevocable, whatever inconvenience I foresee likely to result. And I feel great satisfaction and tranquility in being subject to such an immutable law. If I were capable of breaking it, after such mature consideration, I should lose all respect for myself; and what man of sense would not prefer death to such an alternative?—Tour of a German Prince.

A BRAVE HORSE.—A smart lad was thrown from a high-spirited horse, on the Bloomingdale road, the other day. A witness began to boast him for his lack of equestrian skill—"Or, perhaps," said he, "your horse is naturally tricky?"

"Oh, no, he aint tricky at all," replied the boy, "only he has the knees a little, bender kinder."—New York Mercury.

Our Picture Gallery.

ANECDOTES OF SHARKS.

It may be wrong—I know it is—to hate any creature which God has made, every living thing having, it may be supposed, its uses in creation, and therefore part of a great general economy. At the same time people cannot well avoid having their antipathies. Some have no great affection for rats; few look with anything like satisfaction on snakes and various other reptiles; it has been my misfortune to hate sharks. Yes, I say it unhesitatingly—of all created beings, a shark is to me the most abhorrent. Born in the tropics, and living the chief portion of my life just beyond their verge, where bathing in the sea was more a necessity than a luxury, I have often come into contact in various ways with this fiend of the deep. Fiend of the deep, however, is not the proper term; it lurks also in shallow sunny spots, where the brilliant white sand supports apparently just enough of cool still water to afford a bath for a troop of sympathy or children. In the most retired corner of such a locality, just where the tide will allow of his quick exit, will the brute lurk, and we betide the animal which comes within its reach!—The ground shark is the most dangerous and deadly of all his deadly tribe; for, as a negro once said, "You never see him till you feel him." In the open sea you have some chance for your life; for your enemy is visible from the deck of a ship, or even from a small boat; the deep-sea shark swimming high in the water, and in calm weather generally showing his dorsal fin above its surface. But the ground shark, as its name signifies, lies crouched below you, glaring upwards in all directions as you sit, unsuspicious, on the edge of your bath, or even from a small boat; the deep-sea shark a few yards from it, and instantly refreshing himself. Upon rallying him, he confessed his great dread of sharks. I assured him in that harbor accidents never occurred from any such cause; which was certainly correct, inasmuch as, up to that period, I had never heard of any person having been bitten in it; and in the boys close to the town I should suppose that sharks scarcely ever come, being in that respect very different from the West Indies or the Coast of Africa. I took my usual swim out of the town harbor, and returned unhurt, which that same day, as I was walking with another friend, after the morning service, a constable touched him upon the shoulder, and pressed his services as a jurryman to serve on an inquest then sitting. He declined on the plea of his being a man that morning killed by a shark. We found the poor fellow with a terrible wound, extending from the upper part of the thigh to the knee, the flesh being, in fact, entirely stripped from the bone. He had been in about four feet of water, close to Garden Island, a station for prisoners, situated about eight miles from Sydney higher up the harbor, and further from the sea than the spot where I bathed that morning. The circumstances attending the accident were peculiar. He and some other prisoners had received permission to bathe; he being, however, at the place appointed for them to be mounted—they were not far from the settlement. But one more creek remained to cross, and then they would be within reach of assistance and sympathy from their fellow creatures. Upon the arrival of the boat at the borders of this last creek, as usual, two of the men, carrying poles in their hands, entered it, to ascertain beforehand whether or not it was fordable for the whole number. And their comrades seeing the pioneers reach the other side, and thus relieved the water rising above their waist, prepared to follow in a body, when suddenly one of their guides, uttering a loud shriek, disappeared headlong beneath the surface. His comrade, who was only a few yards in advance of him, ran to ascertain the cause, but he was instantly seized, and the dismayed spectators gazed on, unable in the least to aid their unfortunate companions, who were being torn to pieces before their eyes. For some few minutes they could see the blood, which was glancing in all directions, with now and then, portions of the remains of the unhappy victims, was incessant; but fresh assailants crowded to the spot, and soon nothing but a ripple here and a slight splash there, indicated the locality as one where so fearful a tragedy had been recently acted.

Some species of sharks grow to an enormous size, often weighing from one to four thousand pounds each. The skin of the shark is rough, and is used for polishing wood, ivory, &c.; the fins are esteemed a delicacy in China, and the so called shark-grass spectacle cases are made of it. The white shark is the sailor's worst enemy; he has five rows of wedge-shaped teeth, which are notched like a saw. When the animal is at rest they are flat in his mouth, but when about to seize his prey they are erected by a set of muscles, which give them to the jaw. His mouth is so situated under the head that he is obliged to turn himself on one side before he can grasp anything with these enormous jaws.

A PRINTING FOREST.—M. Eisar, of Bombay, has discovered, in the neighborhood of Cairo, an entire forest converted into sales; the vessel, machinery, and even the most slender fibres of the ordinary rays, and even the most slender fibres, are distinctly visible. The petrified trees are from sixteen to eighteen metres in length. This phenomenon extends over a surface of many hundred miles. The whole desert which is crossed by the road from Cairo to Suez is covered with these trees, which seem to have been petrified on the spot, and in the existing era. At least, this forest is covered by nothing more than sand and gravels. The latter, and the trees imbedded in them, rest on calcareous formations, which contain oysters, with their texture and color so little altered, that one would believe them to have been built but recently by the waters of the sea. It is therefore probable that these substances belong to our own era; and we therefore deduce this interesting fact as tending to prove the transformation of vegetable into new calcareous substances.—M. M. Marcel de Serres and L. Figuier.

SECRETS OF DYEING.—Secrets in dyeing are more easily kept than secrets in most other trades. Dyes usually require an intermediate substance called a "mordant." This word means a bite. This substance bites cloth and bites the dye, and remarried, he drew a diagram of the original precision by a hair's-breadth of error. He was extremely puzzled. At length, in "going over" the knees he perceived that the cloth had been stretched. The mystery was solved, and he turned up his "client's" look of the utmost severity.

"I beg your pardon," he said, in accents of subdued displeasure, "I hope when you gave the order I understood you aright; you intended those for morning, or walking pants."

"I did."

"Why, Mon Gosh! sir, exclaimed the tailor, no longer able to control his feelings, "you have been actually sitting down in them!"

VOLUNTEER SPEAKING.—A friend, who has been to the wars, told us an anecdote, the other day, of a volunteer, which sufficiently shows the estimation in which the Spanish language is held by such chaps in general. It seems a volunteer had lost his horse and saddle, and, meeting a Mexican, accosted him in this wise.

"Hombre, have you seen a caballo wandering around here without nancy a silla not hombre on him?"

"No entiendo," said the Mexican.

"No entiendo, eh! Don't yer understand yer own language, yer fool!—speak! Now just you comme this 'ere caballo immediately, if not mount! D'ye hear?"

"No entiendo" and at the same instant I saw three in the best all standing up and waving their hands, the old gentleman shaking his umbrella in a very emphatic manner. I turned myself quickly round in the water. I have still before the mind the lively image of it; it was surprising then that, springing up as I did, the shadow of my own head and shoulders should startle one so suddenly alarmed as I was. Down I went as quickly as possible, the only chance you have with a shark is to get below him; and if you can reach the bottom, you kick up a dust there, and under cover of the cloud raised, to swim in another direction. I saw nothing, however, except the white legs and body of my brother, who was about thirty yards behind me when I went down, and I came up again. He had seen me go down, and asked me the reason for doing it. I was glad to find that he had not heard the cries from the boat, for he was a timid lad, and I feared the effects upon him. I kept constantly before him, splashing the water in his face, and shouting until he got into a towering passion.—This was what I wanted; for his attention was drawn from the boat. The agony of those moments I shall never forget! I did not know the exact nature of the intimation which was wished to be given us, beyond the simple fact, that it was connected with the dreaded shark. Every moment I expected to see the baleful shadow glide swiftly toward us, and in imagination I felt myself—but it is useless to attempt describing what was the nature of my feelings. They were, in fact, all swallowed up in one sentiment of terrific agitation. A very few minutes must have elapsed before the boat shot up to us and took us in; and yet the space seemed interminable. During the latter part of the time the cry of "shark" had luckily been suppressed, for which I was very grateful; for I dreaded the effect upon my brother exceedingly. When we got safe in, he was ready to pummel me for tormenting him; but when he ascertained the reason, he turned quite pale and sick. It seemed that a boat, anchored some fifty yards or so from ours, had hooked a large shark when we were about one third of our way back to the boat; and the cries were for us to go back on shore, and the boat would come to us. After a struggle, although the hook and line were very strong, he had got off, having bent, or rather straightened the former, while we were still some two hundred yards off.

When in Sydney, I went one Sunday morning to bathe. I was accompanied by a friend who had just arrived from the South Sea Islands. He was very tall, and long and lean, and never going beyond a few yards from it, and instantly refreshing himself. Upon rallying him, he confessed his great dread of sharks. I assured him in that harbor accidents never occurred from any such cause; which was certainly correct, inasmuch as, up to that period, I had never heard of any person having been bitten in it; and in the boys close to the town I should suppose that sharks scarcely ever come, being in that respect very different from the West Indies or the Coast of Africa. I took my usual swim out of the town harbor, and returned unhurt, which that same day, as I was walking with another friend, after the morning service, a constable touched him upon the shoulder, and pressed his services as a jurryman to serve on an inquest then sitting. He declined on the plea of his being a man that morning killed by a shark. We found the poor fellow with a terrible wound, extending from the upper part of the thigh to the knee, the flesh being, in fact, entirely stripped from the bone. He had been in about four feet of water, close to Garden Island, a station for prisoners, situated about eight miles from Sydney higher up the harbor, and further from the sea than the spot where I bathed that morning. The circumstances attending the accident were peculiar. He and some other prisoners had received permission to bathe; he being, however, at the place appointed for them to be mounted—they were not far from the settlement. But one more creek remained to cross, and then they would be within reach of assistance and sympathy from their fellow creatures. Upon the arrival of the boat at the borders of this last creek, as usual, two of the men, carrying poles in their hands, entered it, to ascertain beforehand whether or not it was fordable for the whole number. And their comrades seeing the pioneers reach the other side, and thus relieved the water rising above their waist, prepared to follow in a body, when suddenly one of their guides, uttering a loud shriek, disappeared headlong beneath the surface. His comrade, who was only a few yards in advance of him, ran to ascertain the cause, but he was instantly seized, and the dismayed spectators gazed on, unable in the least to aid their unfortunate companions, who were being torn to pieces before their eyes. For some few minutes they could see the blood, which was glancing in all directions, with now and then, portions of the remains of the unhappy victims, was incessant; but fresh assailants crowded to the spot, and soon nothing but a ripple here and a slight splash there, indicated the locality as one where so fearful a tragedy had been recently acted.

Some species of sharks grow to an enormous size, often weighing from one to four thousand pounds each. The skin of the shark is rough, and is used for polishing wood, ivory, &c.; the fins are esteemed a delicacy in China, and the so called shark-grass spectacle cases are made of it. The white shark is the sailor's worst enemy; he has five rows of wedge-shaped teeth, which are notched like a saw. When the animal is at rest they are flat in his mouth, but when about to seize his prey they are erected by a set of muscles, which give them to the jaw. His mouth is so situated under the head that he is obliged to turn himself on one side before he can grasp anything with these enormous jaws.

A PRINTING FOREST.—M. Eisar, of Bombay, has discovered, in the neighborhood of Cairo, an entire forest converted into sales; the vessel, machinery, and even the most slender fibres of the ordinary rays, and even the most slender fibres, are distinctly visible. The petrified trees are from sixteen to eighteen metres in length. This phenomenon extends over a surface of many hundred miles. The whole desert which is crossed by the road from Cairo to Suez is covered with these trees, which seem to have been petrified on the spot, and in the existing era. At least, this forest is covered by nothing more than sand and gravels. The latter, and the trees imbedded in them, rest on calcareous formations, which contain oysters, with their texture and color so little altered, that one would believe them to have been built but recently by the waters of the sea. It is therefore probable that these substances belong to our own era; and we therefore deduce this interesting fact as tending to prove the transformation of vegetable into new calcareous substances.—M. M. Marcel de Serres and L. Figuier.

SECRETS OF DYEING.—Secrets in dyeing are more easily kept than secrets in most other trades. Dyes usually require an intermediate substance called a "mordant." This word means a bite. This substance bites cloth and bites the dye, and remarried, he drew a diagram of the original precision by a hair's-breadth of error. He was extremely puzzled. At length, in "going over" the knees he perceived that the cloth had been stretched. The mystery was solved, and he turned up his "client's" look of the utmost severity.

"I beg your pardon," he said, in accents of subdued displeasure, "I hope when you gave the order I understood you aright; you intended those for morning, or walking pants."

"I did."

"Why, Mon Gosh! sir, exclaimed the tailor, no longer able to control his feelings, "you have been actually sitting down in them!"

VOLUNTEER SPEAKING.—A friend, who has been to the wars, told us an anecdote, the other day, of a volunteer, which sufficiently shows the estimation in which the Spanish language is held by such chaps in general. It seems a volunteer had lost his horse and saddle, and, meeting a Mexican, accosted him in this wise.

"Hombre, have you seen a caballo wandering around here without nancy a silla not hombre on him?"

"No entiendo," said the Mexican.

"No entiendo, eh! Don't yer understand yer own language, yer fool!—speak! Now just you comme this 'ere caballo immediately, if not mount! D'ye hear?"

"No entiendo" and at the same instant I saw three in the boat all standing up and waving their hands, the old gentleman shaking his umbrella in a very emphatic manner. I turned myself quickly round in the water. I have still before the mind the lively image of it; it was surprising then that, springing up as I did, the shadow of my own head and shoulders should startle one so suddenly alarmed as I was. Down I went as quickly as possible, the only chance you have with a shark is to get below him; and if you can reach the bottom, you kick up a dust there, and under cover of the cloud raised, to swim in another direction. I saw nothing, however, except the white legs and body of my brother, who was about thirty yards behind me when I went down, and I came up again. He had seen me go down, and asked me the reason for doing it. I was glad to find that he had not heard the cries from the boat, for he was a timid lad, and I feared the effects upon him. I kept constantly before him, splashing the water in his face, and shouting until he got into a towering passion.—This was what I wanted; for his attention was drawn from the boat. The agony of those moments I shall never forget! I did not know the exact nature of the intimation which was wished to be given us, beyond the simple fact, that it was connected with the dreaded shark. Every moment I expected to see the baleful shadow glide swiftly toward us, and in imagination I felt myself—but it is useless to attempt describing what was the nature of my feelings. They were, in fact, all swallowed up in one sentiment of terrific agitation. A very few minutes must have elapsed before the boat shot up to us and took us in; and yet the space seemed interminable. During the latter part of the time the cry of "shark" had luckily been suppressed, for which I was very grateful; for I dreaded the effect upon my brother exceedingly. When we got safe in, he was ready to pummel me for tormenting him; but when he ascertained the reason, he turned quite pale and sick. It seemed that a boat, anchored some fifty yards or so from ours, had hooked a large shark when we were about one third of our way back to the boat; and the cries were for us to go back on shore, and the boat would come to us. After a struggle, although the hook and line were very strong, he had got off, having bent, or rather straightened the former, while we were still some two hundred yards off.

When in Sydney, I went one Sunday morning to bathe. I was accompanied by a friend who had just arrived from the South Sea Islands. He was very tall, and long and lean, and never going beyond a few yards from it, and instantly refreshing himself. Upon rallying him, he confessed his great dread of sharks. I assured him in that harbor accidents never occurred from any such cause; which was certainly correct, inasmuch as, up to that period, I had never heard of any person having been bitten in it; and in the boys close to the town I should suppose that sharks scarcely ever come, being in that respect very different from the West Indies or the Coast of Africa. I took my usual swim out of the town harbor, and returned unhur